In the case of an ancient author whose work is known only through quotations, a proper name following a reference indicates the modern editor or compiler of the quoted fragments. Thus, "Frag. 200 Rose" means the edition of Aristotle's Fragmenta by Valentin Rose; "Frag. 72 Gaede," Gaede's edition of the Fragmenta of Demetrius of Scepsis, etc.

MY good friend Timocrates : Discussing the wealth of Lusitania, which is a country in Iberia, now called by the Romans Spain, Polybius of Megalopolis, in the thirty - fourth book of his Histories, says ^a that in that region, because of the temperate quality of the air, animals and human beings alike are very prolific, and the fruits of the country never fail. " For the roses in that country, the wall-flowers, the asparagus shoots, and similar plants leave off bearing not more than three months, while sea-food, in point of abundance, excellence, and beauty, far exceeds that found in our sea. Sicilian barley is worth only a shilling a medimnus, ^b wheat, eighteen-pence, Alexandrian currency. Wine costs a shilling for ten gallons, a kid of moderate size, twopence, as also a hare. The price of lambs is six or eight pence,

^a Kock i. 685. The fishes, like Aristophanes' birds, are a fat pig weighing a hundred pounds is five shillings, a sheep two ; sixty pounds of figs may be bought for sixpence, a calf for five shillings, a yoke ox for ten. The meat of wild animals was hardly deemed to be worth any price ; on the contrary, they trade it off as a bonus for goodwill." Likewise to us the noble Larensis turns Rome into Lusitania on every occasion, filling us daily with all kinds of good things, and exerting himself pleasurably and generously for our benefit, though we bring nothing from home except dissertations.

The long discussion on the subject of fish was evidently irksome to Cynulcus. But the good Democritus anticipated his mood and said : " Nay then, Gentlemen Fish (to quote Archippus ^a), since we too must needs add something to the menu, you have omitted to mention the so-called digging-fish which occur in Heracleia and near Tium in Pontus, the colony of Miletus. Theophrastus gives an account of them.^b This same scholar has also told of the fish frozen in the winter's ice, which have no feeling and cannot move until they are put into the saucepans and cooked. But as compared with these, a very singular thing occurs in connexion with the so-called diggers of Paphlagonia ; for when places there which receive no water from rivers or visible springs are excavated to a considerable depth, live fishes are found in them.^c the fish in the Cleitor river can utter sounds, although Aristotle declares ^a that the parrot-fish and the river-pig are the only fish which can make a sound. And Philostephanus, a native of Cyrene and disciple of Callimachus, says, in his book On Strange Rivers, ^b that in the Aornus river, which flows through Pheneus, there are fishes which make sounds like the note of the thrush ; they are called speckle-fish. ^c Nymphodorus of Syracuse, in his Voyages, says ^d that in the Helorus river there are bass and large eels so tame that they will take bread from the hands of persons who offer it to them. For myself I have seen in Arethusa, near Chalcis—and perhaps most of you have also—mulletts which were quite tame, and eels wearing silver and gold ear-rings, receiving food from those who offered it, bits of entrails from sacrificial victims, and pieces of green cheese. Semus, in the sixth book of his History of Delos, says : ^e ‘ When the Athenians were sacrificing at Delos, the attendant dipped up the lustral water and brought it to them ; but in the vessel which he emptied over their hands were fish as well as water. The diviners at Delos, therefore, told the Athenians that they would have dominion over the sea.’ Polybius, in the thirty-fourth book of the Histories, says ^f that a plain extends from the Pyrenees as far as the Narbo river, through which run rivers, the Illeberis and the Rhoscynus, flowing past like-named cities inhabited by the Celts. In this plain, then, are the fish called diggers. The plain has a thin soil and considerable grass grows there. Under the sandy soil below the grass, at a depth of two or three cubits, flows water which strays from these rivers. With the water fish follow its outlets and swim under the soil to get food, since they like the roots of grass, and so have filled the entire plain with underground fish which the inhabitants catch by digging them up. In India, Theophrastus says ^a fish come out on land from the rivers and leap back again exactly like frogs, being similar in appearance to the fish called maxeini.^b And I have not forgotten, either, what the Peripatetic Clearchus has to say about the fish called 'out-lying,' in the book entitled Water Animals.^c He says (I think I can remember his statement, which is as follows): 'The out-lying fish (called by some adonis) has this name because it often takes its siestas out of water. It is rather reddish, and extending from the gills, on each side of the body as far as the tail, it has a single white stripe. It is round, but since it is not broad, it has the same size as the smaller mullets found near the shore, which are eight inches, at most, in length. In general appearance it is most like the so-called buck fish, except for the black spot under the gullet, which they call the buck's beard. The out-lying belongs to the class of rock fishes, living as it does near rocky shoals. When it is calm, the fish leaps out with the surf and lies a long time on the pebbles, sleeping on dry land and turned toward the sun. When it has had all the sleep it wants, it rolls close to the water, until once more the surf catches it up and carries it with the reflux back into the sea. When it happens to be awake on land, it guards itself against the birds called fair-weather-fowl, such as the halcyon, sandpiper, and that heron which resembles the landrail. These birds, feeding in calm weather along the shore, often encounter the fish, but when it sees them in time it jumps and struggles until finally it escapes by diving back into the water.' Moreover, Clearchus has this also to say, more plainly than Philostephanus of Cyrene, whom I cited before:^a 'For some fishes, although they have no windpipe, utter sounds. Such are the fishes near Cleitor, in Arcadia, in the river called the Ladon. For they can utter sounds, and in fact they make considerable noise.' Nicolas of Damascus, in the one hundred and fourth book of his Histories, says^b that 'near the Phrygian Apameia,^c during the Mithradatic wars, earthquakes occurred which brought to light in the Apameian country lakes never existent before; rivers also and springs besides were opened by the upheaval, while many, again, disappeared; and such a quantity of other water, of a brackish and blue sort, gushed forth in their land, that in spite of its being a great distance from the sea, the neighbouring region was filled with shellfish and all the other fishes which the sea nurtures.' I know, too, that it has rained fishes in many places. Phaenias, for example, says in the second book of The Rulers of Eresus ^a that in Chersonesus it rained fishes for three whole days. And Phylarchus in his fourth book says ^b that certain persons have in many places seen it rain fishes, and the same thing often happens with tadpoles. Heracleides Lembus, for example, says in the twenty-first book of his Histories : ^c ' In Paeonia and Dardania it rained frogs, and so great was their number that they filled the houses and streets.^d Well, during the first days the people killed them and shut up their houses and made the best of it. But soon they could do nothing to stop it ; their vessels were filled with frogs, which were found boiled or baked with their food. Besides, they could not use the water, nor could they set foot on the ground amidst the heaps of frogs piled up, and being overcome also with disgust at the smell of the dead creatures, they fled the country.' I know also that Poseidonius the Stoic speaks of a great quantity of fishes in these words : ^e ' When Tryphon of Apameia, who had seized the kingdom of Syria, was attacked near the city of Ptolemais by Sarpedon, Demetrius's ^f general, the latter was defeated and forced to retreat into the interior with his troops. Tryphon's army were marching along the coast after their victory in the battle, when suddenly a wave from the ocean lifted itself to an extraordinary height and dashed upon the shore, engulfing all the men and drowning them beneath

The followers of Sarpedon, hearing of this disaster, came up and gloated over the bodies of their enemies, while they also carried away an abundance of fish and offered sacrifice to Poseidon, god of the rout, near the suburbs of the city.'

"And I will not pass over in silence, either, the fish-diviners of Lycia, an account of whom is given by Polycharmus in the second book of his History of Lycia. He writes as follows :^a 'Near the shore of the sea is the sacred grove of Apollo, in which there is a pool on the borders of the sand. Whenever they pass through to it, those who would consult the oracle come with two wooden rods, on each of which are pieces of roasted meat, ten in number. The priest seats himself in silence near the grove, while the man in quest of a sign puts the rods into the pool and watches the result. After the rods are put in, the pool is filled with sea-water, and there comes a quantity of fishes, so great and so extraordinary, that one is astounded by the unheard-of spectacle, while he is also rendered cautious by the size of such creatures. And when the spokesman reports the kinds of fish, the oracle-seeker gets from the priest the prophecy of those things which concern his prayer. There appear sea-perch, grey-fish, sometimes even whales or pristis,^b and also fishes never before seen, and strange to the eye.' Artemidorus, in the tenth book of his Geography, says : 'The inhabitants assert that a spring of fresh water bubbles up which produces eddies, and that large fish appear in the whirling space. To them the sacrificers let down first-fruits of offerings on wooden rods, on which are fixed boiled and roasted meats, barley-cakes, and pieces of bread. The name of this harbour and place is Dinus.^a I know that Phylarchus also speaks^b somewhere of large fish, and green figs sent with them, by Patroclus, Ptolemy's general, to King Antigonus by way of hinting what would happen to him, just as the Scythians did to Darius when he was invading their country. For the Scythians, Herodotus tells us,^c sent a bird, an arrow, and a frog; Patroclus, however, as Phylarchus says in the third book of his Histories, sent the afore-said figs and fishes. Now it happened that the king was then drinking deeply, and when all the company were puzzled at these gifts, Antigonus burst out laughing and declared to his friends that he understood what the friendly offerings meant: 'Either,' says Patroclus, 'we must be masters of the sea, or else we must eat figs.'

"And I do not forget that all fish are given the generic name camasenes by Empedocles, the physical philosopher, in this line^d: 'How also the tall trees and the camasenes (fishes) in the sea came into being.' And I know that the author of the epic Cypria, whether it is a Cyprian, or Stasinus, or however he likes to be called, represents Nemesis pursued by Zeus and changed into a fish in these

For she sought to fly, and consented not to join in love with Father Zeus, son of Cronus. For her heart was torn with shame and wrath. Beneath the earth, beneath the unharvested black waters she fled, while Zeus pursued. Eagerly he yearned in his heart to grasp her as she appeared at one time like a fish in the surge of the loud-sounding sea, which excites the vasty deep, at another time along Ocean’s stream and the ends of the earth, at another still, along the rich-loamed mainland. Ever she became all the dread creatures which the mainland nurtures, that she might escape him.’

Both empty into Lake Bolbê. On the Olynthiac is a monument to Olynthus, the son of Heracles and Bolbê. In the months Anthesterion and Elaphebolion, so say the inhabitants, Bolbê sends the broiler to Olynthus, and at this time a limitless quantity of fish go up from the lake into the Olynthiac river. Now it is a stream so shallow that it hardly covers the ankle, nevertheless such a quantity of fish comes that all the inhabitants round about can put up preserved fish sufficient for their needs. The strange part of it is that the fish do not pass beyond the monument of Olynthus. They say, to be sure, that in earlier times the people of Apollonia brought the customary offerings to the dead in the month of Elaphebolion ; but to-day they bring them in Anthesterion. For this reason, therefore, the fish make the ascent only in these months, being those in which people are in the habit of honouring the dead.'

"So much, then, for that, my Fish Masters. For you have got together all manner of lore, and thrown us as food to the fishes,^a not the fishes to us, talking at such length as not even Ichthyas,^b the Megarian philosopher, and not even Ichthyon,^b ever indulged in. This also is a proper name, which Telecleides mentions in The Amphictyons.^c Because of what you have done, I shall command the slave in the words of Pherecrates's Ant-Men ^d: 'Never serve me with a fish, Deucalion, never, not even if I ask it.' And I have a further reason. For in Delos, says Semus of Delos in the second book of his History of Delos,^e 'when they sacrifice to Brizo (who is the interpreter of dreams, and by brizein the ancients meant "to go to sleep," as in^f "there, in sound sleep, we waited for the divine dawn"),—as I was saying, when the women of Delos offer sacrifices to Brizo, they bring her bowls filled with all good things excepting fish, because they pray to her for everything, and especially for the safety of their ships.'

leader of the Porch, for many reasons, but I commend him still more for putting Archestratus, so famous for his Discourse on Cookery, on the same level always with Philaenis. To her is ascribed the authorship of the scandalous treatise on love which Aeschrion of Samos, the iambic poet, says the Sophist Polycrates forged to defame the woman, though she was most chaste. Aeschrion's iambics go as follows ^a: 'I, Philaenis, decried of all men, lie here in long-abiding old age. Do not, vain sailor, as you round the head-land, make of me a mockery and laughter and insult. For, I swear it by Zeus and by his Sons ^b in the world below, never was I lewd or common toward men. Polycrates it was, by birth Athenian, sly in words, an evil tongue, who wrote what he wrote. I know naught of it.' But however that may be, the admirable Chrysippus says, in the fifth book of the treatise On Pleasure and the Good: 'Then there are the books by Philaenis, and the Gastronomy by Archestratus, and powerful stimulants to love and sexual intercourse; similarly slave-girls, skilled in such motions and postures, and ever intent on the practice of these things.' And again: 'That is the kind of thing they learn by heart, and they buy what has been written by Philaenis and Archestratus and the authors of similar trash.' And in the seventh book he says: 'Just as one may not learn by heart the writings of Philaenis or the Gastronomy of Archestratus with the idea that they can contribute anything to better living.' Now you, in quoting so often this Arcestratus, have filled our symposium with scandal. What, I ask, has this noble epic poet omitted, that is calculated to ruin one's morals? He is the only man who has emulated the life of Sardanapalus, the son of Anacyndaraxes, who, as Aristotle said,^a was sillier even than you would expect from his father's name. On his tomb, says Chrysippus, are inscribed these words: 'Though knowing full well that thou art but mortal, indulge thy desire, find joy in thy feasts. Dead, thou shalt have no delight. Yes, I am dust, though I was king of mighty Nineveh. I have only what I have eaten, what wantonness I have committed, what joys I received through passion; but my many rich possessions are now utterly dissolved. This is a wise counsel for living, and I shall forget it never. Let him who wants it, acquire gold without end.' Of the Phaeacians, also, the Poet has said^b: 'And ever to us is the feast dear, and the harp, and dancers, and changes of raiment, warm baths, and sleep.' Another writer's words we have, who was like Sardanapalus, and who also gave this advice to the foolish^c: 'All mortals I fain would counsel to live this fleeting life in pleasure. For he that has died is nothingness, only a shade in the world below. Life is short, and while you live it behooves you to enjoy it.' And the comic poet Amphis says in The Wail from Asia ^a: ‘Whosoever is mortal-born and seeks not to add any pleasure to his life, letting all else go, is a fool before the bar of my judgement and that of all wise men; the gods have damned him.’ Also, in Government by Women, as its title runs, he has similar advice ^b: ‘Drink! play! Life is mortal, short is our time on earth. Death is deathless, once one is dead.’ And a man named Bacchidas, who also lived a life like Sardanapalus, has inscribed on his tomb, now that he is dead: ‘Drink, eat, indulge in all things the heart’s desire. For lo! I stand here, a stone to represent Bacchidas.’

“Alexis wrote a play called The Teacher of Profligacy, says Sotion of Alexandria in his book On Timon’s Satires. I myself have not come across the play. Although I have read more than eight hundred plays of the so-called Middle Comedy and have made excerpts from them, I have not found The Teacher of Profligacy, and I do not even know of anyone who thought it worth cataloguing. Certainly neither Callimachus nor Aristophanes ^c has catalogued it, nor have even those who compiled the catalogues in Pergamum. Well, Sotion says that in this play a slave named Xanthias is represented as inciting his fellow-slaves to high living, and saying ^d: ‘What’s this nonsense you are talking, for ever babbling, this way and that, of the Lyceum, the Academy, and the Odeum gates—mere sophists' rubbish? There's no good in them. Let's drink, and drink our fill, my Sicon, Sicon! Let's have a good time while we may still keep the life in our bodies. Whoop it up, Manes! There's nothing nicer than the belly. That is your father, and again, your only mother. Ethics, embassies, army tactics—fine pretences that sound hollow, like dreams. Fate will snuff you out at the appointed time. You will have only what you eat and drink. All the rest is dust—Pericles, Codrus, Cimon.' It would have been better, says Chrysippus, if the inscription over Sardanapalus had been changed thus: 'Though knowing full well that thou art but mortal, indulge thy desire, find joy in discourse. Eating, thou shalt have no delight. Yes, I am but a ragged remnant, although I have eaten and had pleasure to the utmost. I have only what I have learned, what I have pondered, what noble things I have experienced with their aid, and what is left is a legacy altogether sweet.' Timon, also, has said very rightly^a: 'Foremost among all evils is desire.'

"Clearchus, in his book On Proverbs, says^b that the teacher of Archestratus was Terpsion, who was the first to write a Gastrology and to direct his disciples in what they should avoid. And so Terpsion improvised the following about the tortoise: "'Tis meet to eat or not to eat the tortoise meat.' Others put it in this way : ' One should either eat tortoise flesh or not touch it at all.' ^a But how, most learned commentators, did that fish-authority, Dorion, occur to you ? As if there ever were such a writer ! I know of a music-master of that name who was fond of fish, but no writer. As a music-master he is mentioned by the comic poet Machon thus : ' The music-master Dorion once came to Milltown, but could find nowhere a lodging to hire. So he sate him down in a sanctuary, by chance established without the gates, and seeing the warder sacrificing there, he said : " Tell me, good sir, in the name of Athena and all the gods, whose temple is this here ? " And he replied, " It is Zeus-Poseidon's, stranger." To which Dorion said, " Well, to be sure ! how can a man find lodging here, where even the gods, they tell me, must live two in a room ! " ' Lynceus of Samos, the disciple of Theophrastus and brother of the historian Duris, who also became dictator of his country, says in his Apophthegms : ' A man once told Dorion, the piper, that the ray is a good fish to eat. " Yes," he replied, " about as good as eating a boiled shirt." And when another recommended the belly-slices from tunnies, he said, " Yes indeed. However, one should eat them as I eat them."

^a Because a small amount caused griping pains, a large amount was purgative, Zenob. iv. 19. " Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring." In the dialect of Terpsion there is a humorous effect produced by the many aspirates in the line, which suggest the gagging and choking over the dish. Meineke's witty emendation of κρη for χρη adds to the intentional difficulty in pronouncing the line. Cf. " chewed sticken " for " stewed chicken."

^a i.e., the epicure takes a long time to eat them. Anyone

“And how is that?” he asked. “With pleasure.” He said that crayfish have three properties—leisure; sweet taste, and contemplation.^a When dining at the house of Nicocreon in Cyprus he praised a cup. Nicocreon said, “If you like, the same artisan will make you another.” “Ay, he will make it for you,” he replied; “give me this one.” This was no foolish saying of the piper, in spite of the fact that there is an old saying, “In a piper the gods implanted no sense; no, for with his blowing his sense takes wing and flies from him.”^b And Hegesander has this to say of Dorion in his Commentaries ^c: ‘When his slave failed to buy fish in the market, this epicure Dorion flogged him and told him to recite the names of the best fishes. And when the slave enumerated sea-perch, sea-lizard, conger-eel and others of that sort, he said, “I told you to recite the names of fish, not gods.”’ The same Dorion once made fun of the storm described by Timotheus in The Sailor,^d asserting that he had seen a bigger storm in a seething kettle. Aristodemus, in the second book of Ludicrous Memoirs, says ^e: ‘Dorion the music-master, who was club-footed, once lost the shoe of his lame foot at a dinner-party. He said: “I shall utter no heavier curse upon the thief than the wish that that sandal may fit him.”’ And that this Dorion was notorious for his gourmandism is clear from what the comic poet Mnesimachus says in his play, Philip ^f:

who has eaten the langouste in a bouillabaisse of Marseilles will bear this out.

"I know also the jokes that Lasus of Hermione made about fish, which Chamaeleon of Heracleia has recorded in his book on this very Lasus. He says ^b : 'Lasus alleges that the raw fish can be called cooked.'^c When many expressed surprise at this, he argued the point, saying that whatever may be heard is hearable, and whatever may be known is knowable. By the same reasoning, therefore, whatever may be seen is seeable ; hence, since it was possible to see the fish, it can be looked at (cooked). And on another occasion he purloined in jest a fish from one of the fishermen, and having taken it he handed it over to one of the bystanders. When the fisherman exacted an oath from him, he swore that he did not have it himself nor did he know of anybody else who had taken it ; because he had taken it himself, but somebody else had it, and this person he had instructed to say on oath, in turn, that he had not taken it himself, nor did he know of anyone else who had it. For Lasus had taken it, but he himself had it.' Similar puns are found in Epicharmus, as for instance in Lord and Lady Logos ^d : 'A. Zeus has sent me an invitation to a jam ^e in honour of Pelops. B. That's a very poor dish, my friend, jam ^f ! A. But I didn't say jam : I said a jam !'

^a Kaibel 106. This pun is produced by separating two words (γ' ἔρανον) in one case and pronouncing them as one (γέρανον) in another. So the unfortunate Hegelochus in Aristoph. Ran. 303, makes γαλήνᾳ (γαλήνῃ) sound like γαλήν. Cf. the Tommy's "je suis" for "'igh 'am."

Whenever he happens into the market-place, he’s a hurricane that swoops upon us, for he buys the fish and is gone, taking with him the whole catch. The result is that we then have to fight at the booths where greens are sold.’ And Antiphanes makes a list of persons who loved fish in She goes a-fishing ^b: ‘ Give me first the cuttle-fishes. Lord defend us! They’ve squirted and messed everything. Throw them back into the sea, won’t you, and clean up. Never let them say that they got dirty cuttle-fishes from you, Dorias. eater of them. But there is this turbot ^a here, and if Misgolas sees him, he won't keep his hands off. For really, I want to tell you, when it comes to all the harpers, eagerly he manages a clandestine liaison with them. As for Gobio, who is a very good man, I must send him while he is still jumping to the fair Pythionica. For he is a lusty one. But still, she won't touch him; for she is now keen for Old Smoked Fish. These tiny small fry and this spiketail I have placed apart here for Theano, for they weigh as much as she does.' In these lines Antiphanes has set up Misgolas for ridicule, with very good reason, as a man much interested in handsome harp-singers. For the orator Aeschines, in the speech Against Timarchus,^b has these comments on him: 'Misgolas, men of Athens, the son of Naucrates, of the deme Collytus, is a man in all other respects a gentleman, and one could find no fault with him in any way, excepting in this one matter: he is extraordinarily interested in, and always has in his company, certain men who are harp-singers or harp-players. This I tell you, not for the sake of vulgar calumny, but that you may know him for what he is.' And Timocles says in Sappho ^c: 'Misgolas is never seen to approach you, although he is inflamed by the sight of young men in their bloom.' And Alexis in Agonis, or The Scarf ^d: 'Mother, I entreat you, don't threaten me with Misgolas; for I am no harp-singer.' And when Antiphanes says

No, I mean the pupils of his eyes, which even Melampus, the only man who could cure the daughters of Proetus of their madness, couldn't fix straight.' In similar fashion he ridicules Callimedon also in the play entitled Running-Mates. But on his luxurious eating habits he has the following in Phaedo or Phaedrias^a: 'A. You, if the gods will it, shall be market-commissioner, to do me a favour and stop Callimedon from storming the fish-market twice a day. B. That's a job for tyrants, not market-commissioners. left in them.' And Theophilus, in The Physician,^a ridicules at the same time his frigid oratory: 'Everyone of the lads is eager to serve him. If one buys an eel-slice, he serves it to his father. "Look, Daddy, here's a nice squid." Or, "How about crayfish?" "No," says he; "he's too frigid; away with him! I won't touch politician-meat."' And Philemon says in The Pursuer ^b: 'A crayfish was served to Agyrrhius. As soon as he saw it he cried out, "Hail, dearest papa," and—what did he do?—he ate up his father!' From this passage Herodicus, the disciple of Crates, proved in his Miscellaneous Notes that Agyrrhius was the son of Callimedon.

"The following persons, also, were given to fish-eating. The poet Antagoras would not allow his slave to put oil on the fish, but only to wash ^c it, as Hegesander says ^d: 'Once, with loins girded, he was cooking a dish of conger-eels in the camp. King Antigonus,^e who stood by, asked him, "Do you think, Antagoras, that Homer could have written up the deeds of Agamemnon if he had cooked conger-eels?" To which Antagoras replied rather neatly, "Do you think that Agamemnon could have done those deeds if he had been such a meddler, wanting to know who in his army cooked conger-eels?" And once when Antagoras was boiling a fowl, he declined to go to the bath, for fear that the slaves might guzzle all the broth. At this Philocydes suggested that his mother would keep an eye on it. "What!" said he. "Am I going to trust chicken broth to my mother?" Again, Androcydes of Cyzicus, the painter, was a fish-lover, as Polemon records,^a and he went so far in his passion for luxury that he even painted sedulously pictures of the fishes in the waters about Scylla.

"Concerning Philoxenus of Cythera, author of dithyrambs, the comic poet Machon writes: 'People say that Philoxenus, the dithyrambic poet, was excessively fond of fish. As a consequence, he once bought in Syracuse a polyp measuring a yard, and after preparing it he ate it nearly whole, except the head. Dyspepsia gripped him, and he was in a very bad way. A doctor was summoned to his bedside who, seeing him tossing about in great misery, said: "If you have any matters not yet arranged, make your will quickly, Philoxenus. For you are going to die before the seventh hour." And Philoxenus said: "All my affairs are settled, doctor, and have long since been put in order. By the blessing of the gods I leave behind my dithyrambs in full maturity, and all of them honoured with crowns. These I dedicate to my foster-sisters, the Muses. . . . And Aphrodite and Dionysus shall be their guardians. All this my will makes clear. But now, Timotheus's Charon (the one in his Niobe) won't allow me to dally, but loudly

And so, to make sure that I have all my possessions when I speed below, give me back—the rest of that polyp ! ” ’ And in another passage Machon says : ‘ Philoxenus of Cythera, as the saying goes, once prayed that he might get a throat three cubits long. “ I want,” said he, “ to take the longest possible time in swallowing, and have all kinds of food to delight me at one and the same time.” ’ ^b Diogenes the Cynic also died when his belly swelled up after he had eaten a raw polyp. Syrians of all the sea-gulls.' ^a And in The Icarians the same poet says: ^b 'And so you will cross the Hypereides river, which teems with fish, and in tender tones, or spluttering noisy bombast of reasoned logic, with retraced arguments frequently repeated, is prepared to meet anything when he has loosed the bolts; and ready for hire, he waters the fields of the briber.' And Philetaerus, in Asclepius, says ^c that Hypereides, besides being an epicure, was also a gamester, exactly as Axionicus in Lover of Euripides says of the orator Callias ^d: 'Another fish, confident in his size, hath a certain Glaucus (grey-fish) caught in the sea, brought to these parts to be food for epicures, bearing on his shoulders a dear delight for greedy men. What manner of dressing shall I say it must have? Whether to souse it in yellow sauce, or to oil its body with sprinklings of biting pickle and render it over to flaming fire? One hath spoken; and saith that Moschion, ^e that man devoted to the pipes, will eat it stewed in hot pickle. But he clamours a reproach meant only for thee, O Callias. Thou, verily, hast joy only in figs and salt fish-slices, but wilt not taste the gracious dish served in pickle.' The figs are mentioned because the poet is reviling an informer ^a; the salt fish-slices, doubtless, because Callias did lewd things.^b And Hermippus, in the third book of his work On the Disciples of Isocrates, says ^c that Hypereides always took walks in the fish-market at early dawn. Timaeus of Tauromenium says that the philosopher Aristotle was also a fish-eater. So, too, was the sophist Maton,^d as is made clear by Antiphanes in that edition of The Harp Singer which began, 'No untruth utters he at all'^e: 'Someone came up and began to gouge an eye, as Maton does the eye of a fish.' And Anaxilas, in The Recluse ^f: 'Maton has snatched away and eaten up the mullet's head, and I am undone.' It is an excess of gluttony to snatch when one is eating, especially a mullet's head, unless, to be sure, the experts in these matters know of something useful lurking in a mullet's head; but it would take Archestratus's greediness to make that clear to us.

"Antiphanes, in Rich Men, draws up a list of epicures in these lines ^g: 'Euthynus, wearing sandals and signet-ring, and drenched in perfume, was reckoning up the price of a little matter of fish—I know not what; while Phoenicides and dearest Taureas, gentlemen who have long been in the epicure business, and the kind that greedily gulp down the best cuts in the market, were like to die when they saw the sight, and were furious at the scarcity of fish. Gathering circles around them they said that life wasn't worth living; that it was not to be endured that certain men among you should claim ownership of the sea and spend so much money, while not so much as a bit of fish was being imported. What, then, is the good of having island-prefects? Surely it is possible to compel this by law, that fish should have a special convoy. But to-day Maton has monopolized all the fishermen, and what is more, Diogeiton—of all people!—has persuaded them all to bring their catch to him. It's not democratic, what he's doing, greedily grabbing so much. They had wedding-parties and gay drinking-bouts . . . And Euphron in The Muses^a: 'When Phoenicides, in a company of young men, saw a seething casserole full of Nereus's offspring, he restrained his hands, excited though they were with fury, and called out, "Who says that he knows how to eat at public expense?^b Who says that he has skill to snatch hot stuff from the pile? habits in eating are held up to ridicule by Leucon in Clansmen,^a Aristophanes in The Peace,^b Pherecrates in The Broad.^c And in his play The Fishes,^d Archippus ties him up and hands him over, as being a fish-eater, to the fishes for them to eat up in revenge. Why, even Aristippus the Socratic was a fish-eater, and when reproached on one occasion by Plato for his love of dainties, as Sotion and Hegesander^e say—but here is what the Delphian writes: ‘When Plato criticized Aristippus for buying so many fish, he replied that he had bought them for only fourpence. To this Plato said that he could have bought them himself at that price, whereupon Aristippus said: “You see, Plato! It isn’t I who am a fish-lover, but you who are a money-lover.”’ And Antiphanes, ridiculing a man named Phoenicides for his fish-eating in The Flute-girl, or Twin Sisters,^f says: ‘Menelaus, to be sure, warred ten years against the Trojans for the sake of a woman of lovely countenance, but Phoenicides fights with Taureas for the sake of an eel.’ The orator Demosthenes reviled^g Philocrates for licentiousness and luxury in eating, because he spent the money derived from his treason on harlots and fish. Hegesander says^h that when somebody asked the fish-lover Diocles which fish was better, a conger or a sea-bass, he replied, ‘The first when stewed, the second when baked.’ Another fish-lover was Leonteus, the tragedian of Argos, a pupil of Athenion. He had formerly been a slave of Juba, king of the Mauretanians, according to Amarantus in his work On the Theatre. He says that Juba wrote the following epigram on the occasion of Leonteus's poor performance of Hypsipylê^a: 'Seek not, when gazing on me, Leonteus, echo of an artichoke-eating tragedian, to look into the poor heart of Hypsipylê. For I was once a friend of Bacchus, nor did he ever admire any voice so much as mine, as he listened with golden-lobed ears. But to-day trivets and jars and dry frying-pans have bereft me of voice, because I indulged the belly.' Hegesander also says^b that the fish-eater Phoryscus, being unable to cut off the portion of fish that he wanted, since too much of it clung to the piece, recited^c: 'Those that resist are carried away root and branch,' and thereupon consumed the fish entire. And Bion, when somebody snatched away from him the upper parts of the fish, with a sudden twist snatched it away again himself, and having eaten of it liberally he concluded with the quotation^d: 'But Ino, for her part, finished the work on the other side.' When the wife of the gourmand Diocles died, he took to gourmandizing again during the funeral feast in her honour, weeping the while. Theocritus of Chios said to him: 'Stop your weeping, poor fellow, for it won't do you any good, no matter how much you gourmandize.' Diocles wasted his entire farm in gluttony. Once he swallowed a fish so hot that he said it burnt the roof of his mouth.^a Theocritus remarked: 'The only thing left to you to swallow is the sea, and then you will have consumed the three most important elements—earth, sea, and sky.' Clearchus, recording in his Lives a certain fish-lover, says ^b: 'Technôn, the piper of old times, who was a fish-lover, when Charmus the piper died, sacrificed to his departed spirit some small fry over the tomb.' The poet Alexis was another fish-eater, according to Lynceus of Samos. Some gossips ^c poked fun at him for his gourmandizing, and asked him what he would most like to eat. Alexis answered, 'Some roasted francolins.' There was the tragic poet Nothippus,^d of whom Hermippus speaks in The Fates ^e: 'If it were a question of that class of men, such as we are nowadays, going to war, and they were led by one large roasted ray and a rib of pork, all the others might stay at home after all, and send Nothippus, who would be glad to go.^f For, single-handed, he could swallow the whole Peloponnesus.' That the poet is meant here is clearly shown by Telecleides in The Hesiods.^g The tragic actor Mynniscus is thus derided as a gourmand by Plato in Scum of the Earth ^h: 'A. And Lampon the soothsayer is derided for similar reasons by Callias in Shackled ^a and by Lysippus in The Bacchae.^b Cratinus speaks of him in Runaway Girls ^c : ' Lampon, whom no flaming decree of mortals has power to debar from his friends' table.' And he then adds : ' Once more he's belching now ; for he gobbles anything that is set before him, and he would even fight for the price of a red mullet.' Hedyllus, in his epigrams, gives a list of gourmands and mentions one named Phaedon in these terms : ' May Phaedon the harper carry off the sausages and black puddings ; for he is a gourmand.' He mentions Agis in these lines : ' The beauty-fish is done ; now put the key in the lock, for fear that Agis, that Proteus of the casseroles, may get in. He can turn into water, or fire, or anything he likes, so lock him out ! . . . For he will change himself perhaps into these forms and come, even as Zeus in a shower of gold, to attack this casserole of Acrisius.' Again, deriding a woman named Cleio for similar habits he says : ' Cleio, play the gourmand ; we shut our eyes. But if you please, eat by yourself. The whole conger cost a shilling. or some pledge like that ; but to look at you, we say, would be the act of a madman. For you are our Medusa ; we all, poor devils, are turned to stone, not by the dreadful Gorgon, but by a dish of conger.' Aristodemus says in his Ludicrous Memoirs^a that the gourmand Euphranor, hearing that another fish-eater had died from swallowing a hot slice of fish, exclaimed, 'Death is a sacrilegious robber.' Cindon the gourmand and Demylos (who was another) were once served with a grey-fish, but nothing else. Cindon seized the fish's eye, whereupon Demylos violently attacked Cindon's eye, exclaiming, 'You let go and I'll let go.' Once, at a dinner-party, a fine dish of fish was served. Demylos, not knowing how else he could have it all to himself, spat into it. Antigonus of Carystus, in his Life of Zeno, records^b a remark made by Zeno of Citium, the founder of Stoicism, to the gourmand with whom he lived for a long time. It happened that a large fish was served to them without any other course. Zeno took the entire fish from the platter and made as if he were going to eat it. When the other looked at him reproachfully he said, 'What then, think you, must those who live with you suffer, if you can't endure my gluttony for a single day?' Istrus says^c that the poet Choerilus received four minas a day from Archelaus and spent them on luxurious food, becoming a gourmand. I am not ignorant, either, of the 'fish-eating slaves' whom Clearchus mentions in his work On Sandy Deserts.^d He alleges that Psammetichus,

He is mentioned by Polemon in his Letter to Attalus.^b I know also of the painting in the Pisan territory, set up as an offering in the temple of Artemis Alpheiosa,^c and the work of Cleanthes of Corinth. In it Poseidon is depicted offering a tunny to Zeus, who is in labour,^d as Demetrius records in the eighth book of The Trojan Battle Order.^e

"All this, indeed," said Democritus, "I have myself dished up for you as an additional food-offering, although I have not come forward to pose as a fish-eater because of our most excellent Ulpian. He, following the customs of his native Syria,^f has deprived us of our fish, while introducing other customs from Syria. And yet the Stoic Antipater of Tarsus,^g at least, says in the fourth book of his work On Superstition that it is asserted on the part of some authorities that Queen Gatis of Syria was such a fish-lover that she published an edict forbidding anyone to eat fish 'apart from Gatis'^h (ater Gatis). Not understanding this phrase, the masses call her Atargatis, and abstain from fish. But Mnaseas, in the second book of his work On Asia says ^a: 'In my opinion Atargatis was a cruel queen, and ruled the peoples harshly, even to the extent of forbidding them by law to eat fish; on the contrary, they must bring them to her because of her fondness for that food. For this reason the custom still holds that whenever they pray to the goddess, they bring her offerings of fish made of silver or gold; but the priests bring to the goddess, every day, real fish which they have fancily dressed and served on the table. They are boiled or baked, and the priests of the goddess, of course, consume the fish themselves.' Proceeding a little further he again says: 'Atargatis, according to Xanthus of Lydia,^b was captured by Mopsus the Lydian and with her son Ichthys^c was sunk in the lake of Ascalon because of her outrageous conduct, and eaten up by the fish.' And perhaps you, dear friends, intentionally omitted, as something sacred,^d the fish mentioned by the comic poet Ephippus, which, he says, was dished up for Geryones in the like-named play. His words are these^e: 'Whensoever the dwellers in that country catch a fish—not one of every-day size, but bigger in bulk than Crete, which the sea-waters wash all around—they give him a dish which can hold a hundred of these.^f And the neighbours round about it are Sindians, Lycians, Mygdoniots, Cranaans, Paphians. whenever the king cooks that mighty fish ; and they haul so much of it that it fills the circuit of the city as it stands, while others light the fire underneath. To make the pickle they draw off a lake full of water, and it takes a hundred ox-teams, for eight continuous months, to bring up the salt for it. On the top of the rim of that dish there sail five fast galleys, each with five oars on a side, and the order is given : “ Hurry with that fire, you Lycian foreman ! It’s not hot enough ! Now stop the bellows, you Macedonian captain ! Put out the fire, you Celt, if you don’t want to scorch the fish.”’ I am not unaware that Ephippus has these same lines in his play, The Peltast,^a in which the following also are appended to the foregoing : ‘ This is the kind of nonsense he babbles at dinner, and he lives in the company of schoolboys who look up to him with admiration, although he couldn’t do a sum with counters, and, proud in mien, proudly swishes his foppish coat.’ It is high time, noble Ulpian, that you inquire to whom Ephippus alludes in this description, and explain to us, of these sayings, ‘ if aught therein is indistinct to thee and hard to find out, question again, and learn all clearly ; for more leisure is mine than I desire,’ as Aeschylus says^b in his Prometheus.”

Then Cynulcus cried out : “ What big inquiry—not big fish !—would Ulpian here comprehend ?

He is always picking out the prickly spines ^a of hepseti,^b and smelts, and any other little fish that may be more damnable than they, passing over the big cuts. It reminds me of what Eubulus says in Ixion ^c: 'At fashionable dinners, though cakes of finest meal are served, they always eat only dill or parsley or cress or other silly stuff dressed for them.' In like manner, I think, our 'cauldron devotee' Ulpian, to quote my compatriot Cercidas of Megalopolis,^d refuses to eat anything that becomes a man, but watches the diners to see if they have skipped a spine or gristle or cartilage in the viands served, laying not to heart the saying of the noble and glorious Aeschylus, who declared that his tragedies were large cuts taken from Homer's mighty dinners. And Aeschylus was one of the great philosophers; for once, when he was defeated unfairly, as Theophrastus or Chamaeleon says ^e in the work On Pleasure, he declared that his tragedies were dedicated to Time, and he knew that he should receive his fitting reward.

"How, moreover, can Ulpian understand what the harp-player Stratonicus said of the harp-singer Propis of Rhodes? For Clearchus says in his work On Proverbs ^f that Stratonicus attended a performance by Propis, who, though large of stature, was poor in his art, which fell short of his bodily size; and when people asked Stratonicus who the performer was, he replied 'A poor nobody makes a large fish,' implying that he was first of all a nobody, then poor, and moreover, though large, he was a fish in his lack of voice. But Theophrastus, in the treatise On the Ridiculous,^a while acknowledging that the saying came from Stratoniceus, declares that it referred to the actor Simycas^b by a distortion of the proverb, 'No rotten fish is large.' Aristotle gives the following account of this proverb in The Constitution of Naxos^c: 'The majority of the well-to-do in Naxos used to live in town, while the rest were scattered among the villages. Now in one of these villages, the name of which was Leïstadae, dwelt Telestagoras. He was very rich and famous, and honoured by the people in all other ways, but especially by gifts sent to him daily. And whenever they came down to the village from town and tried to beat down the price of any goods offered for sale, the shopkeepers were in the habit of saying that they would prefer to make a present of their goods to Telestagoras rather than to sell at so small a price. So some young sparks tried to purchase a large fish, and when the fisherman repeated the same old story, they got angry at hearing it so often, and being rather tipsy, they went rioting to the house of Telestagoras. But though he welcomed them kindly, the young men assaulted him and his two daughters, who were of marriageable age. At this the Naxians in great indignation took up arms and attacked the young men, and a serious civil war began, the Naxians being led by Lygdamis, who, as a result of this military leadership, rose to be tyrant of his native land. . . .'

mentioned the harp-player Stratonicus, to add something myself to what has been said about his cleverness in repartee. Being a teacher of harp-players, he had in his studio nine statues of the Muses, one of Apollo, and just two pupils; and when somebody asked him how many pupils he had, he replied, 'With the assistance of the gods,^a a round dozen.' Once he journeyed to Mylasa, where he saw many temples but very few people. So he took his place in the middle of the market and called, 'Oyez, oyez, ye temples!' ^b And Machon records these reminiscences of him: 'Once on a time Stratonicus journeyed to Pella, having previously heard from several sources that the baths there usually made people splenetic. Well, observing several lads exercising in the bath beside the fire, all of them with bodies and complexions at the top of their form, he said that his informants had made a mistake. But when he came out again, he noticed a man who had a spleen twice as large as his belly. (He remarked :) "The door-keeper who sits here and receives the cloaks of patrons as they enter must plainly have an eye on their spleens as well, to make sure immediately that the people inside are not crowded." A wretched harper was once entertaining Stratonicus, and while the wine flowed he began to display his art to him. The appointments of the dinner were gorgeous and pretentious; and Stratonicus, having enough of the music, and no one else to talk to, smashed his cup. He then asked for a larger one, and receiving many cups he pledged them in turn to the Sun, alternately drinking and dozing, trusting the rest to fate. By chance, so it appeared, a revel band of acquaintances burst in upon the singer, and Stratonicus immediately became quite drunk. When they asked him further why he had been continually drinking much wine and had made himself drunk so soon, he answered: "This crafty and abominable harper has given me a dinner and then slain me like an ox at the manger."^a Once Stratonicus travelled to Abdera to attend the spectacle which was to be given there, and he saw that every citizen had a personal herald who proclaimed separately, whenever he desired, the coming New Moon; and seeing that the heralds in that region were, one might say, far too many, in proportion to the common folk, he walked carefully on the tips of his toe-nails in the town, his eyes intent upon the ground beneath. When a stranger there asked him what had suddenly happened to his feet, he replied: "I'm all right, stranger, in all my limbs, and I can run much faster to a dinner than any parasite. But I am torn with anxiety and utterly afraid that I may tread on a herald^b and impale my foot on him." When a poor piper was on the point of playing his pipes at a sacrifice Stratonicus said: "Hush, until we've poured a libation and prayed to the gods!"

Clcon was a harp-singer, nicknamed Ox, who sang terribly off the pitch, shamefully abusing his harp. Having heard him to the end, Stratonicus remarked : " We used to have a proverb about the Ass and the Lyre,^a but now it's the Ox and the Lyre." Stratonicus the harp-singer once sailed to Pontus to visit its king, Berisades. After a long stay there, he wanted to return to Greece. But when it appeared that Berisades would not allow it, they say that Stratonicus answered him thus : " What ! you don't intend to stay here yourself, do you ? " Again, Stratonicus the harp-singer once found himself, a stranger, in Corinth. There an old hag kept looking at him and would not desist, no matter where he went. And he : " In the gods' name, granny, tell me what you want, and why you keep gazing at me ? " " I wondered," she said, " that your mother could carry you for ten months and hold you within her womb, when our city smarts with the pain of keeping you a single day." Axiothea, Nicocreon's wife, attended by her pretty maid, went to a dinner and broke wind, and then trod on an almond with her Sicyonian slipper and cracked it. When Stratonicus heard it he said, " Not the same sound ! " But when night came on, because of that saying he paid for his frank speech in the waters of the sea.^b A poor harp-singer in Ephesus, it appears, once exhibited his pupil to his friends.

^a " An ass listening to a lyre, a pig listening to a trumpet," said of one who had no ear for music.

Stratonicus, who happened to be present, said :
 “ The man who cannot teach himself to play because he is so bad, is seen at his worst when he tries to teach others.”

“ Clearchus, in the second book of his work On Friendship, says ^a : ‘ The harp-player Stratonicus, whenever he started for bed, would tell his slaves to bring him a drink. “ Not so much because I am thirsty,” he said, “ as because I don’t want to be thirsty.” In Byzantium a harp-singer sang his prelude beautifully, but made a mess of the songs that followed. Stratonicus got up and made proclamation : “ Whoever will reveal the hiding-place of the harp-singer who sang the prelude will receive a thousand drachmas.” When he was asked by someone who were the most god-forsaken people, he said that of the Pamphylians, the Phaselites were the most so, but of the inhabited world, the people of Sidê were the most god-forsaken.’ ^b And again, Hegesander says, ^c when he was asked whether the Boeotians were perhaps more uncivilized than the Thessalians he replied, ‘ the Elians.’ And once he set up a trophy in his schoolroom with this inscription, ‘ In protest against all bad harpers.’ Asked by someone which boats were safer, the fast galleys or the round-bottomed merchantmen, he answered, ‘ Those which are safely moored.’ Giving a recital in Rhodes and receiving no applause, he left the theatre remarking, ‘ If you won’t give that which costs you nothing, how can I expect to receive any contribution from you ? ’ He used to say : ‘ Let Elians manage athletic contests, Corinthians musical contests, and Athenians dramatic contests. If, however, any of them makes a mistake, let the Lacedaemonians be flogged for it.’ Thus he satirized the flagellations held in Lacedaemon, as Charicles says ^a in the first book of his work On the City Contest. When King Ptolemy was discussing with him, rather too contentiously, the art of harp-playing, he said, 'O King, a sceptre is one thing, a plectrum is another.' This is told by the epic poet Capito in the fourth book of his Notes addressed to Philopappus. And having been invited on one occasion to hear a harp-singer, after the recital he quoted ^b: 'And the Father granted one part to him, but denied him the other.' When someone asked, "Which part?" he answered: 'He granted the power to play badly, but denied the power to sing beautifully.' And once a beam (dokos) collapsed and killed a bad man. He said: 'Gentlemen, meseems (dokô) there are gods; if not, there are beams (dokoi).'

"The following sayings, appended to what have been quoted above, are recorded ^c in the Reminiscences of Stratonicus. When the father of Chrysogonus declared that he enjoyed the possession of every theatrical appurtenance in his own house, since he himself was a theatrical producer, while one of his sons would bring out plays, and the other would furnish the flute accompaniment, Stratonicus said to him: 'There is still one thing you need besides.' He asked, 'What?' Stratonicus replied, 'An audience in your own house.' When somebody asked him why he roamed all over Greece, instead of staying continuously in one city, he answered that he had received all Greeks as toll from the Muses, and he exacted pay from them for their ignorance of the Muses.^a Of Phaon he used to say that he played not harmony,^b but Cadmus, on his pipes. When Phaon pretended to be a proficient piper, and alleged that he possessed a chorus at Megara, he said: 'Nonsense! You don't possess anything there, you are yourself possessed.'^c He said that he was particularly surprised at the mother of the sophist Satyrus because she had carried for ten months one whom no city could bear for ten days. Learning that Satyrus was staying in Troy to attend the Trojan games he said, 'Troy hath ever had misfortune!' When Mynnacus^d disagreed with him on a question of music he said that he would pay no attention to him because he spoke over his ankle.^e He said that a poor doctor could send his patients to Hades in a single day. Meeting an acquaintance whose shoes, he saw, had been nicely polished, he expressed sympathy for his poverty, believing that they could not have been so nicely polished if the man had not done it himself. In Teichiûs, near Miletus, lived a mixed population. When he observed that all the tombs belonged to foreigners he said: 'Let's get out of here, slave. For it appears that foreigners in this place die, but not a single citizen.' While the harper Zethus was lecturing on music^f . . . he declared that Zethus was the last person who should talk on music, 'because,' as he said, 'you have chosen the most unmusical of names, calling yourself Zethus instead of Amphion.'^g

While giving a lesson in harp-playing to a Helvetian pupil, he became enraged at the pupil's failure to do as he was told and cried out, 'To hell-vetia with you!' ^a Once he saw a richly decorated shrine beside a poor bath-house which supplied only cold water. When he came out, after an uncomfortable bath, he said: 'I don't wonder that there are so many votive tablets dedicated here; every man who takes a bath here makes an offering for having been rescued alive.' He said that in Aenus it was freezing for eight months of the year and winter during the other four. 'The people of Pontus,' ^b he used to say, 'had come up out of the vasty deep,' meaning 'out of perdition.' He used to call the Rhodians 'Cyrenaeans with white skins' and 'a community of suitors' ^c; Heracleia was 'Androcorinthus' ^d; Byzantium was 'the armpit of Hellas'; the people of Leucas were 'Corinthian left-overs,' the Ambraciots were 'Membraciots.' ^e As he came out of the gates of Heracleia he looked carefully around, and when someone asked him why he was so careful he said he was ashamed of being seen, because it was like coming out of a bawdy-house. Seeing two men confined in the stocks he exclaimed, 'Small-town stuff that—not to be able to man the stocks completely!' To a student of music who had formerly been a gardener and who got into an argument with him on a question of music, he quoted, 'Every man should tend ^f the

Afterwards, as they led him and asked him where he was, he replied, 'Opposite the public-house,' because Maroneia was reputed to be a collection of pubs. When Telephanes, who was lying on the couch beside him, began to blow his flute, Stratonicus said, 'Get up, as belchers should!' When the bath-tender in Cardia furnished a soap-powder of vile dust, and water which was brackish, he said that he was besieged by land and by sea. Victorious over his competitors in Sicyon, he dedicated in the Temple of Asclepius a trophy with the inscription: 'Dedicated by Stratonicus from the spoils of bad harp-players.' After a certain singer had finished his song he asked whose tune that was. Receiving the reply, 'It is by Carcinus,'^a he said, 'Indeed it must be; no man could have written it.' He used to say that in Maroneia they never had summer, but simmer.^b In Phaselis^c the bath-tender got into a quarrel with Stratonicus's slave over the fee, it being the custom to charge foreigners a higher price for a bath. He said, 'You foul slave, you have nearly made me into a Phaselite by the turn of a paltry farthing.' To the man who praised him in the hope of getting something he said that he was a bigger pauper himself. Listening to The Birth-pangs of Semelé, by Timotheus, he remarked: 'If she had borne a theatrical manager instead of a god, what screeches she would be letting forth!' When Polyidus was boasting because his pupil Philotas had carried off the prize instead of Timotheus, Stratonicus said, 'I am surprised that you don't know that Philotas merely makes decrees, while Timotheus makes laws.'^a To the harper Areius, who was boring him, he said, 'Sing yourself to the devil.'^b In Sicyon he replied to a currier who had insulted him and called him a cur, 'You cur-rier!'^c The same Stratonicus, observing that the Rhodians were lascivious and given to hot drinks, used to say that they were Cyrenaeans with white skins.^d Rhodes, itself, he called a city of suitors; for while he thought that the Rhodians differed in colour, but not in prodigality, from the Cyrenaeans, he also likened their city to the suitors in its proneness to pleasure. In respect of these repartees Stratonicus tried to emulate the poet Simonides, according to Ephorus in the second book of his work On Inventions^e; he says, too, that Philoxenus of Cythera had the same ambition. In fact they say that his outspoken jesting cost him his life at the hands of Nicocles, king of Cyprus ; he was compelled to drink poison for poking fun at the king's sons.^b

"As for Aristotle's minuteness in details, I am lost in admiration of it, my good Democritus. These wiseacres have had him constantly on their lips, and even you revere his words as you do those of the other philosophers and orators. When did he learn it all ? From what Proteus or Nereus, rising out of the deep,^c did he learn what fishes do, or how they go to bed or pass the day ? Indeed, the things he has recorded are such as to be what the comic poet calls ' Marvels for simpletons.'^d He says, namely, that periwinkles and all testacea are, as a class, non-copulating, and that the purple-shell and the periwinkle are long-lived. How could he know, in fact, that the purple-shell lives six years ? Or that the viper remains the longest time in the act of copulation, that the ringdove is the largest of the doves, and next comes the rock-pigeon, while the turtle-dove is the smallest ? How does he know, too, that the stallion lives thirty-five years, whereas the mare lives more than forty ? He even declares that one lived for seventy-five years ! He records that from the copulation of lice nits are generated ; that from the transformation of the grub comes the caterpillar from which is formed the silk-cocoon, and from this, what is termed the 'necydallus.'^a What is more, he says that bees live as much as six years ; some, even seven. No bee or drone, he declares, has ever been seen in the act of copulating, hence it is impossible to tell which of them are males, which females. How, again, does he know that men are inferior to bees ? The latter, indeed, maintain the even course of their lives, never changing, always accumulating, and they do this untaught. But men are inferior to bees, and are as full of false opinion^b as bees are of honey. Where did he observe that ? Again, in the treatise On Longevity, he says that a fly has been seen to live six or seven years. What is the proof of this, really ? Where has he seen ivy growing from a stag's horn ? Owls, he asserts, and ravens,^c are unable to see by day ; hence they hunt their food by night, and not all night either, but during nightfall^d ; and their eyes are not alike in appearance, for some have dark grey eyes, some black, others light-grey. That the eye of man varies in all sorts of ways, and that differences in character are associated with their eyes, is another assertion.^e For men with goat-like eyes are well endowed with sharpness of eyesight and have the most upright characters. In the case of other men, some have their eyes projecting, others sunk in, others are intermediate. Those whose eyes are set in are the most sharp-sighted, those with projecting eyes have the most evil dispositions, those with eyes intermediate, Aristotle says, are good men. Some, again, are given to blinking, others to staring, others are midway between. The blinkers are fickle, the starers are impudent; those which are midway between are of the best characters. Man, moreover, is the only animal which has the heart on the left side, all others having it in the centre. Males have more teeth than females. This, he says, has been observed in the case of the sheep, the hog, and the goat. No fish that grows ever has testicles, nor does either fish or bird have breasts; the dolphin alone has no gall-bladder. Some fishes, he says, have the gall-bladder, not next the liver, but close to the intestines; such are the elops, the synagris, the lamprey, the swordfish, and the flying-fish. The amia has a gall-bladder which extends the entire length of the intestine; the hawk and the kite have the gall-bladder close to the liver and the intestines; the horned owl has it close to the liver and the stomach. As for pigeon, quail, and swallow, some have it close to the intestines, some, close to the stomach. Soft-skinned creatures, testacea, selachians, and insects copulate a long time. The dolphin and some of the other fishes copulate while resting side by side; the intercourse of dolphins is a slow process, while that of (other) fishes is rapid. Moreover, the lion, Aristotle says, has hard bones, and when they are struck sparks blaze forth as if from stones; and though the dolphin has bones and no spine, the selachians have both cartilage and spine. fish ^a . . . Some creatures live on land, some in the water, some are born of fire.^b There are also some which are called ephemera ^c and live but a single day. Amphibians are such as the hippopotamus, crocodile, and otter. All animals have two guiding feet; the crab has four. All red-blooded animals, he says, either have no feet, or two feet, or four feet; but all that have more than four feet are bloodless. Hence, all animals that have motion move by the notation four: man, by two feet and two hands; bird, by two feet and two wings; eel and conger-eel, by two fins and two flexures. Further: some animals have hands, like man; others only seem to have them, like the monkey. For no dumb animals give or receive, those actions being just what hands, as instruments, are given for.^d Again, among animals some have joints, like man, the ass, the ox, while others are inarticulate, like snakes, oysters, and the pulmonary molluscs. Many animals do not show themselves at every season, for example, those which hibernate underground; and those which do not hibernate are not seen at all times, for example, swallows and storks.

And yet I am aware that Epicurus, the ardent devotee of truth, has said of him, in his letter On Vocations,^e that after he had devoured his inheritance he entered the army, and on meeting with poor success in the campaign he betook himself to drug-selling. Aristotle went so far as to hazard himself there, and attended the lectures, being no dullard, and gradually assumed the contemplative habit. I am aware, too, that Epicurus is the only one that has said these things against him, and not Eubulides as well ; nor has Cephisodorus, even, ventured to say that kind of thing against the Stageirite, although both he and Eubulides have published tracts against the man. In the same letter Epicurus says also that Protagoras the sophist, from being a porter and wood-carrier, became the private secretary of Democritus. For the latter, struck by something peculiar in the way in which Protagoras piled wood, gave him his first start by adopting him into his household. He then taught reading and writing in some remote village, and from this branched out into the sophist's profession. And so I, fellow-banqueters, will branch out from this long discussion into the immediate practice of belly-stuffing."

Because of this long feast of words, somebody ordered the cooks to continue to see to it that the dishes they served should not get cold ; for no one can eat cold viands.^a And Cynulcus said : " To quote Milcon, by the comic poet Alexis^b : ' I (he says) . . . even if they don't serve hot dishes. Plato declares that the Good is everywhere good. Do you understand me ? What is pleasing is in all cases pleasing, both here and yon.' Again, that was not an unwitty remark of Sphaerus, who studied under Cleanthes at the same time with Chrysippus. Having been summoned to Alexandria by King Ptolemy,^a when some fowls made of wax were served at dinner, he stretched forth his hands to take them, but was restrained by the king on the ground that he was assenting to a falsehood. But he neatly explained by saying that he did not assent to the proposition that they were birds, but that it was probable that they were birds. The realizable presentation of sense differs from the probable—for the former is free from deception whereas the probable might turn out otherwise. And so in our own case let's have even some wax food served, so far as the realizable presentation of sense is concerned, so that, even though we may be capable of erring in vision, at least we may not spend all our time in silly talk."

Again we were just on the point of dining, when Daphnus told us to stop, appropriately quoting the iambic verse from The Blockhead (or Breezes) of Metagenes.^b "Whenever we dine, you know, that is the time when we all babble most." The last, in his book On Food for Sick and Well, says that, of the salt-water fish, the rock-fishes^d are easily digested, very juicy and purgative, but unsubstantial and of little nourishment; but those caught in deep water are less easily digested, very filling, hard to assimilate. forked hake, male and female, are very tender small fishes, free from smell and easily digested ; the sea-perch has resemblance to them, yet differs slightly according to locality. Gobies are like the perch ; the small white ones are tender, free from smell, juicy, and easily digested ; the yellow (also called stalk-fish) are dry and lean. The cannas have tender meat, yet are tougher than the perch. The parrot-fish has tender meat, flaky, sweet, light, easily digested and assimilated, loosening the bowels. But when recently caught the parrot-fishes should be eaten with caution, since they hunt and feed on the sea-hares. Hence their inner parts may cause cholera morbus. The fish called ceris ^a has tender meat, loosens the bowels, and is wholesome. The chyle from it gently moistens ^b and purges. The sea-perch (orphanos or orphôs) has healthy and abundant juices, is viscous, not easily digested, very filling, and diuretic. That is, the parts next its head are viscous and easily digested, while the meaty parts are hard to digest and heavier. The cut by the tail is more tender. This fish is likely to cause clammy humours ^c and to be hard to digest. Hammer-fish are more nourishing than conger-eels. The lake-eel is more tasty and nourishing than the sea-eel. The gilt-head has qualities resembling those of the black-tail. The yellow deep-sea sculpins are more nourishing than the large ones caught in lagoons by the shore. The gilt-head is acrid, tender-fleshed, free from smell, of good taste, and is diuretic ; when boiled it is digestible, but when fried, it is hard to digest. The red mullet has a good taste, but is rather astringent, tough-fleshed, hard to digest, and checks the action of the bowels, especially when baked over coals; but the fried mullet is also heavy and hard to digest; in general, all mullets have the effect of secreting blood. The synodon and pole-fish belong to the same family, but the pole-fish is superior. There is, to be sure, a pagrus caught in streams, but the sea-pagrus is better. The boar-fish is called also mouse-fish ^a; it has a bad smell and is tough, and harder to digest than the turbot. Yet it has a skin which tastes good. The tailor—or needle-fish (also called ablennes ^b) is hard to digest, yet watery and easy for the bowels. The anchovy and its allied types, herring and sardine, are easily assimilated. The barbed mullet occurs in the ocean, in lakes, and in streams. This fish, Diphilus says, is also called sharp-snout. The crow-fish is the special product of the Nile. The black is inferior to the white, the boiled to the baked. For the latter is good both for stomach and bowels. The salpa ^c is tough and unpalatable; but the salpa found in Alexandria is better, as well as that which comes in autumn; for it exudes something watery and white which is not, however, of bad odour. The gryllus ^d resembles an eel, but is unpalatable. The hawk-fish has tougher meat than the cuckoo-fish, ^e but resembles it in other respects. Also the crow-fish is tougher than the hawk-fish. The star-gazer, also called the sacred fish, or even the beauteous-name, ^f are too rich. The bôx, ^g when boiled, is easily digested and assimilated, gives out moisture and eases the bowels. Baked on coals, it is sweeter and tenderer. The bacchus^a has good and plentiful juices and is nourishing. The male sprat^b is unpalatable, indigestible, and smelly. Plaice and flounders are nourishing and pleasant. Like these is the rhombus.^c The white mullets, the cephalis,^d grey mullets, slime-fish and chellones^e are alike in their value as food, but the grey mullet is inferior to the cephalus, the slime-fish is still poorer, and the chellon ranks last. The tunny (both thynnis and thynnus) are rich and filling. The sea-bass called acarnan is sweet and astringent, also filling and easily eliminated. The anchovy is rich and hard to digest. The white variety is called cobitis. The hepsetus,^f that very tiny fish, belongs to the same class. Of the selachians the cow-fish is fleshy, but the dog-fish, especially that called stellata, is superior. The thresher shark (fox-fish) resembles the land animal in taste, whence it got its name. The ray is tasty, but the stellated ray is tenderer and juicy. The smooth-ray is more costive, and is smelly. The electric ray, in general hard to digest, has parts near the head which are tender and wholesome and even digestible, but the other parts are not; the small ones are superior, especially when cooked plainly. The file-fish, another selachian, is digestible and light. The larger is also the more nourishing. In general, all the selachians are windy and meaty and hard to digest, and when eaten too plentifully they dull the eyesight. The cuttle-fish even when boiled is tender, tasty, and digestible, and also eases the bowels. The chyle from it is adapted to thinning the blood and assisting purgation when that is obstructed by piles. The squid is more digestible and filling, especially when small. But the boiled squid is tougher and not tasty. The polyp, while it is an active aphrodisiac, is tough and indigestible. The larger sized is more nourishing. When cooked for a long time it gently moistens the bowels and settles the stomach. Alexis in Pamphila makes plain the usefulness of the polyp when he says:^a 'What is better for a man in love, Cteson, than the things which I have brought with me here? There are periwinkles, scallops, bulbs,^b a large polyp, and fine large fish.' The palamyde is filling and rich, diuretic also and hard to digest; but when smoked like the cube tunny^c it eases the bowels and is attenuating. The larger-sized is called synodontis. The chelidonias tunny, though resembling the palamyde tunny, is tougher. The flying-fish that resembles the polyp produces a liquid which promotes a good complexion and stirs the blood. The horse-mackerel^d is miry; the larger sort resembles the chelidonias tunny in point of toughness, but the slices from under its belly and the shoulder-bone^e are tasty and tender. The so-called costae,^f when smoked, are of moderate value. The yellow tunny is to a certain degree unsavoury; it is tenderer than the horse-mackerel. This, then, is what Diphilus has to say.

says that among the larger fishes there is a kind called by some sliced,^a by others deep-sea, such as the gilt-heads, the grey-fishes, and the pagruses. They are hard to digest, yet when digested they afford many times more nourishment. Then there is the kind known as scale-less fishes, such as tunnies, mackerel, female tunny, congers and the like, which, as it happens, are gregarious. Those kinds which neither appear solitarily nor yet run in schools are more digestible, such as congers, sharks, and the like. The gregarious kinds among these fish afford eating which is delightful (for they are rich), but heavy and hard to digest. Hence they are best adapted to smoking, and of all preserved fish these are the best kinds. But they are good when baked, since their rich fat is then melted. The kinds called darta ^b are in general those which have a rough top-growth on the skin, not scales, but the kind found on rays and file-fishes. All these, to be sure, are digestible, but not of good odour; they also furnish the body with moist nutriment, and purge the bowels better than all other boiled fish; for those which are baked are inferior. The mollusc class, such as polyps, cuttle-fishes, and the like, have a flesh which is not easily digested; hence they are adapted to stimulating sexual desire. For they are in themselves of the nature of breath, and the sexual crisis requires a bodily state which is full of breath. Molluscs are better when boiled, since the liquids which they contain are poor, as may be seen, at least, from those which they exude when they are washed. These liquids, then, are elicited from the meat by boiling. For if the heat is applied gently, together with the water it acts as a cleansing process. Baking, on the other hand, tends to dry up these liquids; and further, since their meat is naturally tough, it is to be expected that they should become so (when baked ^a). Small fry, anchovies, young herrings, and all other fish whose bones we eat as well as the meat, produce a windy digestion in all cases and yield a moist nutriment. Since the process of digestion here is not even, but the meat is very quickly digested while the bones are dissolved slowly (for small fry, undressed, are full of bones), the digestive process is impeded in the case of each by the other. The result is that digestion causes winds, while the food causes humours to arise. And so they are better when boiled, and their purgative action on the bowels is uneven. The so-called rock-fish,^b gobies, sculpins, plaice, and the like, yield our bodies a nutriment which is dry (they have compact flesh, are filling and digest quickly, and do not leave behind much refuse), and they are not productive of winds. Every kind of fish is more easily digested when it is prepared for the table in a simple manner; in fact rock-fishes taste better ^a when dressed simply. Like these are the class called soft-fleshed, thrushes, blackbirds,^c and so on. They are, to be sure, more liquid than rock-fishes, but afford more enjoyment in the process of assimilation. They are more purgative and diuretic than rock-fishes because their flesh is more liquid and abundant than that of the aforesaid. If one desires to purge the bowels, he should boil them before giving ; if, however, the bowels are regular, they are nourishing even when baked. For diuretic purposes, they are useful when prepared in both ways.^a As for the places in the sea where streams and lakes have outlets in it, or again where there are large lagoons and bays of the sea—in these places all fish are more liquid and more rich ; and while they are pleasanter to eat, they are poorer in digestive and nourishing qualities. On the other hand, on the shores facing deep seas, or very much exposed, most fish are tough, thin, and wave-battered.^b In places where the sea is deep inshore, and not oppressed by strong gales, especially if there are any towns near—in such places, I say, most kinds of fish are uniformly the best, whether in respect of flavour, or ease of digestion, or nourishment of the body. But those sea fishes which migrate from the sea into streams and lakes are hardest to digest and heaviest, such as the mullet, and, in a word, all fishes which have the power of living in both kinds of water.^c Of those which live entirely in rivers or marshes, the river fish are the better ; for a marshy place is the putrefaction of water. ^d And of the river fishes, in turn, those are best which are found in the most rapid streams, especially the fiery-spots,^e for these are not found except when a stream is rapid and cold, and they are supreme among river fish in digestibility.

“ Here, gentlemen, you have our offering of food, contributed as healthfully as our powers permitted. For, as Antiphanes says in The Parasite^a: ‘ I have not, to be sure, spent too much effort in purveying your food, nor, on the other hand, have I cut my labours too short, so that a man who has, anyhow, lost his head by drinking, could lay on me the blame for a headache à la grecque.’^b Nor, again, am I so fish-loving as the man in the same poet’s Butalion, which play is a revision of one of those entitled The Farmers. For he says^c: ‘ A. To-day, let me tell you, I am going to give you a feast. You, Pistus,^d take some money and go to the market for us. P. Not me! For anyhow I don’t know how to buy profitably. A. Tell me then, Philumenus, what kind of fish do you like? PH. I like ’em all! A. Yes, but explain in detail, what kind of fish would you like to eat. PH. Well, once a fishmonger came into the country with a load of sprats and mullets, and Zeus is my witness, he became very popular with all of us. A. Then do tell me, would you eat some of them now? PH. Yes, and if there be any other small kind. For I hold that all these large fishes are man-eaters.’^e A. How’s that, dear friend? Man-eaters!

^a Kock ii. 87. The text of this notorious fragment remains uncertain; see critical notes.

^b The meaning seems to be that the entertainment provided has not been scamped, and therefore the host cannot be charged by a befuddled critic with causing a too moderate headache. Greek drinking-parties were regarded as temperate; cf. 431 e.

What do you mean? P. He means, of course, what a man would eat. But these are Helen's food that he speaks of, sprats and mullets.' Now in The Farmer he had said that sprats and mullets were Hecate's food.^a Ephippus also speaks contemptuously of the small kinds of fish in Philyra^b: 'A. No, but the lady has just offered sacrifice; we'll dine to-morrow on Coronê's calf.^b Again, the Peevish Man, who was a terrible miser in the play of that name by Mnesimachus, says to the young man who leads a spendthrift life^c: 'Nay, I entreat you, don't exact too many things from me, your own uncle—things which are too cruel, too overlaid with money. Make your demands moderate. B. But good Heavens, man, how could they be more moderate? A. How? Fool me by using diminutive terms. Whereupon Plutarch said: "It is a story told in Rhodes, which I cannot at this moment repeat by heart, because it is a very long time since I have seen the book which contains it. a handful of barley to the Crow, Apollo's daughter ; or a plate of wheat, a loaf of bread maybe, or a farthing-bit,^a or whatever you please. Give to the Crow, good sirs, something of what each of you has on hand. She will accept a lump of rock-salt ; yes, she likes very much to feast on that. Who gives salt now will give honeycomb another day. Boy, push back the door ! Abundance has heard us, and a maid brings figs for the Crow. Ye gods, may the girl prove to be blameless in every way, and may she find a husband rich and famous ; I hope she may lay a son in the arms of her old father, and a girl baby on the lap of her mother—her own offspring to be nurtured as a wife for one of her kinsmen. As for me, wherever my feet carry me, I go in turn and sing at the door with tuneful muse, whether one gives or does not give more than I ask.' And at the end of the iambics he says : ' Nay, good sirs, hand out some of the wealth which your pantry hoards. Give, master, and you too, lady bride, give ! It is the custom to give a handful to the Crow when she begs. That is the refrain I sing. Give something, and it will be enough.' Those who took up collections for the Crow were called Coronists, as Pamphilus of Alexandria says in his work On Names ; and the songs sung by them are called Coronismata,^b as Hagnocles of Rhodes records in the article ^a Coronists. Another ceremony of collecting is called among the Rhodians 'Playing the Swallow;' of this Theognis speaks in the second book of his Rhodian Festivals. He writes ^b : 'There is a sort of collecting the Rhodians call Playing the Swallow, which occurs in the month Boëdromion. The term "swallowing" is used because of the custom of singing in refrain ^c : "The Swallow has come, has come! She brings fair weather, and fair seasons. Her breast is white, her back is black. You there! Trundle out some pressed fruit from your rich store, a cup of wine, a tray of cheeses. A wheat-cake, too, and pulse-bread,^d the swallow does not spurn. Are we to go away (satisfied), or shall we grab something for ourselves? If you give us something—^e Otherwise, we won't let you bc. We'll carry off your front door, or the lintel over it, or the good-wife sitting within. She's a little thing, we can easily lift her. So if you give us anything, make it something big! Open, open the door to the Swallow. Indeed we are not old men, but little boys." This mode of collection was instituted first by Cleobulus of Lindus, when the need of collecting money once arose in Lindus.'

" Since we have mentioned Rhodian stories, I am now going to do some fish-collecting for you from fair Rhodes on my own account, because the entertaining Lynceus says that Rhodes is well supplied with fish. Now Ergias of Rhodes, in History of My Native Land, after prefacing some remarks on the Phoenicians who settled the island, says ^a that Phalanthus and his followers occupied a very strongly fortified city in Ialysus ^b called Achaea ; and having control of the water-supply, they were able to hold out a long time against the siege laid by Iphiclus. In fact, they also had a prophecy divinely given in an oracle, which said that they would hold the country until crows became white and fishes appeared in their mixing-bowls. Since, then, they were confident that this would never happen, they became more lax in carrying on the war. Iphiclus learned from some source about the oracles given to the Phoenicians ; so he intercepted by means of an ambush a trusted follower of Phalanthus, named Larcas, as he was going to get water, and having exchanged pledges with him, he caught some small fish in the spring, and placing them in a water-jar he gave it to Larcas, and told him to take this water and pour it into the mixing-bowl from which Phalanthus was accustomed to have his wine dispensed. This Larcas did. Then Iphiclus caught some crows, and having smeared them with gypsum, he let them go. Phalanthus saw the crows and then went up to the mixing-bowl ; and when he saw the fish as well, he reasoned that the country was theirs no longer and made overtures through heralds to Iphiclus, proposing that he should be allowed to retire with all that were with him, under the protection of a truce. Iphiclus agreed to this, but Phalanthus devised a trick, as follows: he slaughtered and disembowelled some sacrificial victims, and tried to carry out his gold and silver money in their bellies. But Iphiclus was apprised of the trick and succeeded in preventing it. And when Phalanthus reproached him with the oath which he had sworn, that he would allow to be carried out 'whatsoever they carried in their belly,'^a he answered the quibble by giving them boats for their departure, but took away the rudders, the oars, and the sails, saying that he had sworn to supply boats, but nothing else. In despair the Phoenicians buried a large quantity of their money, marking the hiding-places in order that they might recover it if they ever came back later; but a large part they abandoned to Iphiclus. In this manner, then, the Phoenicians departed from the country, and the Greeks got control of affairs. The same facts are recorded also by Polyzelus in his History of Rhodes. He says^b that the trick of the fishes and the crows was known only to Phacas and his daughter Dorcia. She had fallen in love with Iphiclus, and having through her nurse become engaged to marry him, she persuaded the man who carried the water to take the fish and put them into the mixing-bowl, while she herself white-washed the crows and let them go.

"Creophylus, in Chronicles of the Ephesians, says^c that the founders of Ephesus, after suffering many hardships because of the difficulties of the region, finally sent to the oracle of the god and asked where they should place their city. And he declared to them that they should build a city 'wheresoe'r a fish shall show them and a wild boar shall lead the way.' It is said, accordingly, that some fishermen were eating their noonday meal in the place where are the spring to-day called Oily and the sacred lake. One of the fish popped out with a live coal and fell into some straw, and a thicket in which a wild boar happened to be was set on fire by the fish. The boar, frightened by the fire, ran up a great distance on the mountain which is called Trecheia (Rough), and when brought down by a javelin, fell where to-day stands the temple of Athena. So the Ephesians crossed over from the island after living there twenty years, and for the second time settled Trecheia and the regions on the slopes of Coressus; they also built a temple of Artemis overlooking the market-place, and a temple of the Pythian Apollo at the harbour."

While much talk of this nature was still going on, right then was heard all through the town the ringing notes of flutes, the crash of cymbals and the beating of drums, accompanied by voices in song. It so happened that it was the festival of the Parilia, as it used to be called, though it is now called the Roman Festival, instituted in honour of the Fortune of Rome, when her temple was erected by that best and most enlightened of emperors, Hadrian. That day is celebrated annually as especially glorious by all the residents of Rome and by all who happen to be staying in the city. Therefore Ulpian said: "What is that, gentlemen? 'Is it a solemn banquet, or a wedding? For surely this cannot be a dinner to which all men

But you have purloined a word from the slums, ^g and have utterly spoiled the wine by pouring water on it." ^h Then Myrtilus said: "Nevertheless, I will prove to you, Master Critic, ⁱ that the word is more in accord with Greek usage. For though you try to muzzle us all, you have not convicted any of us of ignorance, whereas you proclaim yourself more empty than a serpent's slough. ^j You surprise me indeed; for Epicharmus in The Pilgrims mentions 'ballismus' as the word for dancing, and Italy is not far from Sicily. Well, in this play the pilgrims inspect the votive offerings at Delphi, and in their enumeration of them all in turn, they say ^k: 'Cauldrons of bronze, mixing-bowls, spits. Look! On the supports are children dancing—a marvellous work!' And Sophron also, in the mime entitled

Busied with the Bride, says ^a: ‘Thereupon he took it and stood forth,^b and the others danced.’ And again: ‘Dancing, they filled the room with ordure!’ What is more, Alexis also says in The Hairdresser ^c: ‘Look, I can see a crowd of fellows coming to revel, evidently with the idea that here are assembled the élite. I hope it may not be my lot to meet you alone in the dark after you have had a high time at the ball, for in that case I should never carry home my cloak, unless I grew wings.’ I know of the word in other places, too, and after thinking them over I will produce them. But you who have just cited these lines from Homer ^d: ‘What feast, what throng is this? What hast thou to do with it? Is it a solemn banquet, or a wedding? For surely this cannot be a dinner to which all men bring their share’—you are the right man to tell us how these terms differ. But since you keep silence, I will explain. For, just as the Syracusan poet ^e says: ‘That which it took two men to say before me, I can answer sufficiently alone.’ All sacrifices and the more elaborate feasts were called eilapinae ^f by the ancients, and those who participated in them, eilapinastae. But eranoi are dinners got together from food contributed by the diners, the word being derived from erân (love), because all mutually love and contribute. The same kind of dinner may be called either eranus or thiasus, and the members who come together eranistae or thiasotae. Again, the noisy crowd which follows in the train of Dionysus is a thiasus, as Euripides says ^a: 'And I saw three troops (thiasi) of women in revel bands.' Now the thiasi were so called from the word theos (god). And (if you object that it has an i instead of an e), the Lacedaemonians call the gods sioi. But eilapinae are so called from the elaborate preparation and expense connected with them, since laphytto and lapazo mean to empty out, to spend; hence the poets use alapazo even of sacking a town, and the loot which is carried away is called laphyra because of the greed for spoiling (laphyxis). And all such feasts are called eilapinae by Aeschylus ^b and Euripides, ^c because one is completely emptied (lapatto) of his store. Again there is a verb lapto meaning to digest food, to become loose by emptying; hence, from the word meaning loose (lagaros) comes lagôn meaning flank, as also laganon, a thin wafer, ^d and from lapatto comes lapara, also meaning flank. ^e Laphytto means the same as lapatto, that is, to loosen or empty out in a lavish and extensive fashion. The verb dapanô (spend) arises from dapto (devour), since this latter word is closely connected with the idea of abundance; hence, of persons who eat greedily and bestially, we have the words dapto and dardapto. ^f Homer ^g has catadapto: 'Nay, dogs and birds of prey had devoured him.' But they called feasts euôchiai not from ochê, which means food, but from eu echo, meaning well-being in respect of these things. At these feasts, accordingly, people who honoured the divinity gathered and gave themselves up (methiemi) to jollity and relaxation; and so they called the drink methy,^a while the god whose gift this is they called Methymnaeus or Lyaeus^b or Euius^c or Ieius,^d just as they called the man who was not scowling or gloomy hilaros (cheerful). Wherefore, they thought that the divinity must prove propitious (hileôs) when they shouted the refrain iê, iê! So also they named the place in which they practised this ritual hieron (temple). Ehippus, in the play entitled Merchandise, makes it clear that they could call the same person hileos or hilaros. Of a certain courtesan he says ^e: 'And then, let me tell you, if one of us happen to come in feeling downcast, she greets him with pleasant flattery; she kisses him, not tightly pressing her lips together, as if he were hateful to her, but opening her mouth as fledgling sparrows do; she gives him a chair, she speaks consoling words, she makes him cheerful (hilaros), and soon takes away all his gloom, and renders him propitious (hileos) again.'

"But the ancients, having conceived the gods as bearing the likeness of men, also constituted their festivals in accordance with the customs of men.^f For they observed that it was not possible for men to resist the impulse to enjoyment, while on the other hand it was useful and expedient to accustom men to a disciplined and orderly use of such things; so they set definite times, and after first sacrificing to the gods they let themselves go in relaxation, their purpose being that everyone should believe that the gods had come to receive the first-fruits and libations, and so might join in the assemblage with due reverence. Homer^a says, for example : ‘ Athena too came to receive her sacrifice.’ And Poseidon^b ‘ had departed for the Aethopians far away, to receive his hecatomb of bulls and rams.’ And Zeus^c ‘ went yesterday for a feast, and all the gods followed together with him.’ And if a man be present, one perhaps who is elderly and of serious deportment, they respectfully refrain from saying or doing anything indecent, in accordance with what Epicharmus says somewhere^d : ‘ Nay, it is good to keep silence when one’s betters are present.’ In their assumption, then, that the gods were near them, they conducted their festivals in an orderly and sober manner. Hence among the ancients it was neither customary to recline, but ‘ they feasted sitting down’^e ; nor yet to drink to intoxication, but ‘ when they had poured libations and drunk all that heart desired, they went each to his own house.’^f But the men of to-day, who pretend to sacrifice to the gods and call together their friends and intimates, curse their children, quarrel with their wives, drive their slaves to tears, threaten the crowd, all but repeating

Homer's line ^a: 'But now go to your dinner, that we may join battle;' not taking to heart the words spoken by the author of Cheiron, whether it is Pherecrates or the metrician Nicomachus or whoever it may be ^b: 'And do thou not, having bidden a friend to the bounteous feast, become vexed at his presence. For only an evil man does that. Nay, rather, have joy in thy heart undisturbed, and give him joy as well.' But to-day they do not remember these injunctions at all; on the contrary, they learn by heart the lines which follow these, all of which are a parody drawn from the Great Eoëae commonly ascribed to Hesiod: 'But if one of us sacrifices and invites another to the meal, we are vexed if he comes, and look angrily at his presence, and desire him to depart at the door with what speed he may. Thereupon he recognizes this somehow and begins to put on his sandals, and one of the company says: "What? Going already? Why don't you take a drink? Take your sandals off, won't you?" But the host who is sacrificing gets angry at the man who would detain him, and straightway recites the verses of elegy ^c: "Don't try to detain among us anyone, so that he should stay against his will, and don't wake up a man who is asleep, Simonides." Is not this, really, the kind of thing we say over the wine, ^d when we give a dinner to a friend?' Again, we add these lines ^e also: 'And when the feast brings many guests at common expense, be not discourteous. Great is the delight, while the cost is very little.' When we sacrifice to the gods, we spend very little, and that too an ordinary sum, as the good Menander makes clear in The Carouse^a: 'So, then, our prosperity accords not with the way in which we offer sacrifice. For to the gods I bring an offering of a tiny sheep bought for ten drachmas, and glad I am to get it so cheap: but for flute-girls and perfume, harp-girls, the red Thasian wine, eels, cheese, and honey, the cost is almost a talent; and whereas by analogy it is fair that we should receive only ten drachmas' worth of blessing, even supposing that our sacrifice to the gods prove auspicious, and so cancel the loss of the one by the other—is not the nuisance of making the sacrifice doubled? For my part, were I a god, I would never have allowed anyone to put the loin on the altar unless at the same time he offered the eel for consecration; that would have been the end of Callimedon,^b one of the eel's kinsmen!'

"The ancients also have a name for certain dinners, 'added to boot,' which are what Alexandrians call dinners 'by special contribution.'^c Alexis, for example, says in the comedy entitled In the Well^d: 'A. At this very moment the boss has sent me out to fetch a jar of wine from the neighbours within. B. From in there? I understand. That is going to be something added to all the rest. A. I like an old woman who is so discerning!' And Crobylus in The False Substitute^a: 'A. And I was coming to see you, Laches. Do you go on ahead. L. Where to? A. You ask me where to! Why, to Philumena's, in whose house our special contributions are. It was in her honour that you forced me yesterday to drink a pint^b of wine neat.' The ancients also know of what are to-day called 'basket dinners.'^c Pherecrates explains what this is in The Forgetful Man, or The Sea,^d as follows: 'He packed a dinner into the basket and went off, as though he were going to the house of Ophelias.' This clearly refers to the basket dinner, when a man gets up a dinner for himself, and putting it into a basket goes to somebody's house to eat it. Lysias has used the word syndeipnon for symposium in the speech Against Micinus, a murder case. He says^e: 'He had been invited to a syndeipnon.' And Plato also said^f: 'With those who had got up the syndeipnon.' So Aristophanes in Gerytades^g: 'Singing the praises of Aeschylus at the syndeipna.' Hence some authorities require that the title of Sophocles' play be written in the neuter, Syndeipnon.^h Sometimes dinners are also called synagogima^a; so Alexis, in A Man of Taste, or The Nymphs^b: 'Lie down now and call in the girls. Let's have a get-together. Although to be sure I know that your ways have long been those of a skin-flint.' And Ephippus in Geryones^c: 'And they are paying more than their share for a get-together symposium.' They also used the verb synago (gather) of drinking one with another, and synagogion (gathering) of the symposium. Menander, In the Flames^d: 'And at this moment, for these reasons, they are gathering (drinking) apart by themselves.' Then in what follows he said: 'He paid for the gathering.' Possibly the dinner called 'contributed' is meant here. And what 'contributions' are is indicated by Alexis in The Woman who drank Belladonna by these lines^e: 'A. I will come then with you, bringing contributions. B. What do you mean by contributions? A. Why, old woman, the people of Chalcis call ribbons and perfume bottles contributions.' But the Argives, as Hegesander says in his Commentaries, have other words. He writes as follows^f: 'The contribution brought in to the symposia by the drinkers is called by the Argives a chôs (heap) while the single share is called an aisa (lot).''

“ AND let us once more bethink us of supper, and let them pour water over our hands ; and in the morning there will be tales ” ^a for you and for me, Timocrates. In fact, no sooner were some hams served to us, and someone had asked whether they were tender, than Ulpian began : “ In what author is that word takeron for ‘ tender ’ found ? And who has called napy (mustard) sinapy ? For I see that it is served in side-dishes along with the hams (koleoi). Yes, koleoi ; for I know that this word is used thus as a masculine, and not, as our native ^b Athenians would have it, solely as a feminine. ^c Epicharmus, at any rate, says in The Woman from Megara ^d : ‘ Sausage, cheese, hams (koleoi), vertebrae ; but of things fit to eat, not a single thing.’ And in Cyclops ^e : ‘ Sausages are nice, I swear by Zeus, and so is a ham (koleos).’ Learn this, too, of me, most learned men, that in this line Epicharmus speaks of sausage as chordé, though elsewhere he always calls it orya. Again, I see seasoned salt in other side-dishes. But our Cynics are full of unseasoned salt ; among them, to quote Antiphanes, ^f another Cynic says in The Bag : ‘ A. Of brow.' Thus Crates, according to Seleucus in his work On Hellenism. But the verse is from The Knights, and runs thus^a: 'He had a mustard (napy) look.' No Attic writer ever said sinapy. Yet either form is reasonable. For napy is, as it were, naphy,^b because it has lost growth; for it is without size and small, just like aphye.^c Sinapy, on the other hand, is so called because it hurts (sinetai) faces (opes) in the smelling, just as the onion (krommyon) is so called because we close (myomen) our eyes (korai). The comic poet Xenarchus said in The Scythians^d: 'This pain isn't pain any more; my little daughter has applied a mustard-plaster by the help of the foreign woman.' Salt and vinegar also are mentioned by the excellent Aristophanes in the lines about the tragic poet Sthenelus. He says^e: 'And how could I ever chew the words of Sthenelus? Can I souse them in vinegar or white salt?'

"We then, my good fellow, have contributed these examples to help you answer your questions.^f And now you should answer the question, in what author the word paropsis^g is used of the well-known vessel. For I know that Plato, in Holidays, uses the word of a specially prepared, mixed dish, or some spice^h of that sort, thusⁱ: 'Whence we might have a barley-cake and side-dishes.' But in Europa, again, he uses the word in an extended passage of any exquisite delight; in it is the following^j: 'A. A sleeping woman is inert. z. I understand that! A. But when she is awake, the side-dishes, taken by themselves alone, are a much greater contribution to pleasure than all else. z. What, are there 'side-dishes' in loving, I entreat you? And in the next lines he goes on to describe these 'side-dishes' as if he were speaking of a relish at table. Again, in Phaon^a: 'F frivolous dallings are like side-dishes; their delight is brief, and quickly are they spent.' Aristophanes in Daedalus^b: 'To all women, in one way or another, at least, an adulterer ready for his work is like a side-dish.' "

Since, then, Ulpian had nothing to say, Leonides spoke up: "But I have a right to speak, having for a long time kept silence. As Evenus of Paros says^c: 'Many there be whose habit is to dispute everything indiscriminately, but further than that, it is not their habit to dispute soundly. And against these one ancient saying suffices: "To you these things may seem so to be, but to me they seem otherwise."' One can very soon convince the wise by a word well spoken, for they are the easiest to instruct.'  And Alexis in Hesionê^c: 'When he saw two fellows bringing in the table laden with its adornment of varied saucers,^d he no longer had eyes for me.' Again, the author of the lines attributed to Magnes says, in Dionysus, first edition^e: 'These are saucers full of troubles for me.' And Achaeus in the satyric drama Aethon^f: 'Let me have other well-stewed saucer-meats served chopped in fine bits, and steaming dishes aflame on the side.' And the comic poet Sotades in Ransomed^g: 'Plainly I am only a side-dish to Crobylus; he masticates Crobylus, but bolts me on the side.' But Xenophon's use of the word, in the first book of Cyropaedeia, is ambiguous. For that philosopher says^h: 'He set before him side-dishes and all kinds of sauces and meats.' And in the author of Cheiron, which is attributed to Pherecrates, the word paropsis is used of a sauce, and not, as Didymus maintains in his treatise on The Corrupt Use of Words,ⁱ of the vessel containing it. Pherecrates says^j: 'Zeus is my witness, these fellows, like side-dishes, have qualities according to their seasoning, and the host who has invited them regards them as second book of *Similar*s, says that radish, turnip, rape-turnip, and nose-smart are similar. Glaucus, in The Art of Cookery, calls the rape-turnip (raphys) rapys, spelling it with p without the aspirate. There is nothing else similar to these except what is to-day called bounias.^a Theophrastus, though he does not mention the bounias by name, speaks ^b of a certain turnip which he calls male-turnip, and perhaps this is the bounias. Nicander mentions the bounias in the Georgics^c: "Turnips shalt thou sow on ground levelled with a roller, that they may grow more level and equal to their moulds."^d Sow bouniades, too, and carrots, evenly with cabbages. Of turnip and cabbage, in truth, two families appear in our gardens, long and solid." Cephisian turnips are mentioned by Crates in Orators thus^e: "Very much like Cephisian turnips." Theophrastus says^f there are two kinds of turnips, male and female; both grow from the same seed. Poseidonius (he of the Porch), in the twenty-seventh book of his Histories, says^g that in Dalmatia there are turnips that grow without cultivation, and carrots that grow wild. Diphilus, the physician of Siphnos, says that the turnip is thinning, acrid, and hard to digest; it is also likely to cause flatulence. The bounias, he says, is better; for it is sweeter and more digestible, in addition to being wholesome and nourishing. The roasted turnip, he adds, is more easily digested, but is excessively thinning. Eubulus mentions it thus in Ancylion^a: "I bring you here a turnip for roasting." And Alexis in God-inspired^b: "I babble the while I roast slices of turnip for Ptolemy." The pickled turnip is more thinning than the boiled, especially when it is done in mustard, according to Diphilus.

The Cabbage.—Eudemus of Athens, in his book On Vegetables, says that there are three sorts of cabbage, the so-called halmyris,^c the smooth-leaf, and the parsley-leaved; in flavour the halmyris is judged supreme. "It grows in Eretria, Cyme, and Rhodes, also in Cnidus and Ephesus. The smooth-leaf grows in all countries. The parsley-leaved has its name from its curliness, for in this respect it resembles parsley, and also in its tendency to compactness."^d Theophrastus writes thus^e: "Of the rhapphanos (by which I mean the cabbage) there are two sorts, one curly-leaved, the other wild." Diphilus of Siphnos says: "The cabbage which grows in Cyme is very good and sweet, but in Alexandria it is bitter. Seed brought from Rhodes to Alexandria produces a cabbage which is sweet for the first year, but after that period it becomes acclimatized."^f Nicander says in the Georgics^g: "Smooth-skinned is the cabbage, but sometimes it occurs in wild state, with many leaves, and grows rank in seeded gardens; either branching in curly tendrils with brownish leaves, or purplish and like disordered hair, or again, in ugly greenish tints its hollow leaf is like the sole-leather with which they mend sandals turned and patched ; it is the plant which those of yore called the prophet among vegetables." Now perhaps Nicander has called the cabbage a prophet because it is sacred, since in the iambic verses of Hipponax something of this kind is said ^a : " But he slipped away, and made entreaty of the seven-leaved cabbage, to which Pandora sacrificed a moulded cake at the Thargelia to take the curse away." ^b And Ananius says ^c : " And I like you by far the most in all the world, so help me Cabbage !" And Telecleides in The Prytanes said ^d : " So help me Cabbages !" So Epicharmus in Earth and Sea ^e : " So help me Cabbage !" Eupolis in The Bathers ^f : " So help me Cabbage !" It was thought that this oath was Ionian ; and it is not surprising that some people swore by the cabbage, seeing that even Zeno of Citium, the founder of the Porch, imitated Socrates' oath by the dog and swore, in his turn, by the caper, as Empedus says in his Reminiscences.^g At Athens, too, a cabbage was prepared for women in childbed as a kind of antidote in their food. Ephippus, at any rate, says in Geryones ^h : " If that is so, then how is it that there is no wreath before the doors, no savour of cooking strikes the tip ends of the projecting nose, though the feast of the Amphidromia is on? For then it is the custom to toast slices of Gallipoli cheese, to boil a cabbage glistening in oil, to broil some fat lamb chops, to pluck the feathers from ringdoves, thrushes, and finches withal, at the same time to devour cuttle-fish and squids, to pound with care many wriggling polyps, and drink many a cup not too diluted." But Antiphanes mentions the cabbage as a cheap food in these lines from The Parasite^a: "You now understand what kind of things they are—wheat loaves, garlic, cheese, flat-cakes, things which gentlemen eat; not smoked fish, not lamb chops spread with seasoning, no jumbled pastry, and dishes fit to ruin men. Yes, and they will boil sleek cabbages—ye gods!—and serve pea-soup with them." zelus, mentioning them by the name crambê in Birth of the Muses, says ^a: "Many tall-leaved cabbages."

Beets.—As to these, Theophrastus says ^b that the white is juicier than the red, has fewer seeds, and is called Sicilian. He ^c says that the seutlis is different from the teutlon. Hence the comic poet Diphilus criticizes ^d someone in the play of The Hero for misuse of the word, "and calling teutla seutlides." Eudemus, in his book On Vegetables, says there are four kinds of beets—the drawn, the stalked, the white, the common; the last is dun-coloured. Diphilus of Siphnos says that the beet is juicier than the cabbage and is somewhat more nourishing; when boiled and eaten with mustard it is more thinning and calculated to destroy worms. The white acts more readily on the bowels, the red is more diuretic. Their roots are also better flavoured and more nourishing.

The Carrot.^e—"This is pungent," says Diphilus, "very nourishing and fairly wholesome, with a tendency to loosening and windiness; not easy to digest, very diuretic, calculated to rouse sexual desire; hence by some it is called love-philtre." Numenius says in The Art of Angling ^f: "Of the herbs which grow unsown or are found rooted in our fields in winter, or when flowering springtime comes, there are the scraggly cardoon and the wild carrot, the deep-rooted rape-turnip, and the wild bur-parsley." Nicander in the second book of the Georgics says ^a: "Among them, too, are the high stalk of the fennel, the roots of rock-parsley, with it, also, the scraggly carrot itself, horse-parsley, sow-thistle, hound's-tongue, and chicory; with them, too, thou shalt pound the pungent leaves of edderwort, or the herb which is called bird's milk." Theophrastus, also, mentions the carrot. Phaenias, in the fifth book of his work On Plants, writes as follows ^b: "With respect to the qualities of its seed, the so-called seps and the seed of the carrot." And in the first book he says ^c: "Umbelliferous types of seeded plants are found in anise, fennel, carrot, bur-parsley, hemlock, coriander, and squill, which some call mouse-bane." Since Nicander has mentioned edderwort, it should be added that Phaenias, also, writes as follows in the book before-mentioned ^c: "Edder-wort, which some call arum. . . ." ^d Dio-cles, in the first book of his Hygiene, calls ^e the carrot (staphylinus) astaphylinus. What is called the "sliced," which is a large, well-grown carrot, is juicier than the carrot and more heating, diuretic, wholesome, and easy to digest, as Diphilus records.

The Leek.^a—This, the same Diphilus says, is also called prasium, and it is more juicy than the “sliced” plant (carrot). It is also moderately thinning, nourishing, and also likely to cause flatulence. Epaenetus in The Art of Cookery says that leeks are called gethyllides (spring onions). This name, I find, has received mention in Eubulus’s Pimp, as follows ^b: “I couldn’t touch a bit of bread; for I have just eaten at the house of Gnathaenium; I found her cooking spring onions.” But others say that this is what is called gethyon (horn onion), mentioned by Phrynichus in Cronus.^c Didymus, in his explanatory notes on this play, says that horn onions are similar to the so-called vine-leeks, and that the same are also called gethyllides. These last are mentioned thus by Epicharmus in Philoctetes ^d: “Among them were two heads of garlic and two horn onions.” Aristophanes in Aeolosicon, second edition ^e: “Roots of horn onions, with qualities that imitate garlic.” Polemon the geographer, in his work On Samothrace, says that Leto had a pregnant woman’s craving for the horn onion. He writes as follows ^f: “It is ordained among the Delphians that whosoever shall bring for the festival of the Theoxenia ^g the largest horn onion to Leto, shall receive a portion from the table. And I have myself seen a horn onion as large as a turnip or the round radish. They relate that

The Gourd.—Once, in the season of winter, cucumbers were served to us,^a and we all wondered, thinking they were fresh, and we recalled what the witty Aristophanes said in The Seasons when he praised the fair city of Athens in these lines^b: "A. You will see, in midwinter, cucumbers, grapes, fruit, wreaths of violets, roses, and lilies—a dust-cloud utterly blinding. The same tradesman sells thrushes, pears, honeycomb, olives, beestings, haggis, celandine, cicadas, embryo-meat. You can see baskets of figs and of myrtle-berries together, covered with snow, and what is more, they sow cucumbers at the same time with turnips, so that nobody knows any longer what time of the year it is. . . . A very great boon, if one may get throughout the year whatever he wants. B. A very great evil, rather! For if they couldn't get these things, they wouldn't be so eager for them and spend so much money on them. As for me, I would supply these things for a brief season and then take them away. A. I too do that for other cities, but not for Athens. The Athenians enjoy all these things because they revere the gods. B. Much good, then, does it do them for revering you, as you say! A. Why, how's that? B. You have made their city Egypt instead of Athens."^a We wondered, as I was saying, that we should be eating cucumbers in the month of January; for they were fresh and had all their native savour. But it so happened that they belonged to the class of things which are compounded by cooks who know how to play these kinds of tricks. Accordingly, Larensis asked whether the ancients also understood this use. Ulpian replied: "Nicander of Colophon, in the second book of his Georgics, mentions this use, but he names these gourds sikyae; they were, in fact, called thus, as we have explained before.^b He says^c: 'As for the gourds themselves, cut and skewer them in clues and dry them in the air; then hang them up over the smoke, so that when winter comes the slaves may have enough to fill the capacious pot and gulp it down at their ease, and that the girl who grinds the corn may pour in to the vat boiled pulse of every kind. In it, too, they have laid the clues of gourd, after thoroughly washing them, and mushrooms and dried vegetables long since plaited in strings, with broccoli-stalks as well—to lie all together until spring comes.'"

Chickens.—Chickens followed the gourds and other "shredded" vegetables. This last is a term used^d by Aristophanes in The Woman of Delos, of chopped vegetables : “ Shredded, or pressed in cakes.” So Myrtilus spoke up : “ Colloquial usage to-day calls only hens ^a by the name of birds and birdlings, a great number of which I see being served. (And the philosopher Chrysippus, in the fifth book On Pleasure and the Good, writes as follows : ‘ Just as some persons are more inclined to regard white fowls as pleasanter to the taste than dark.’) But the male birds are called cocks or cockerels. Yet among the ancients the word ornis (bird) was used, both as a masculine and a feminine, of other birds as well, and not merely of this special sort, concerning which colloquial usage speaks of ‘ buying birds.’ ^b Homer, at any rate, says ^c : ‘ Many birds, under the sun’s rays.’ And elsewhere he has the feminine ^d : ‘ To the shrill bird.’ Also ^e : ‘ As a bird brings to her unfledged nestlings a morsel when she has found it, but with herself it goes hard.’ But Menander, in the first edition of The Heiress, clearly brings out the colloquial usage when he says ^f : ‘ A cock crowed lustily. Won’t you shoo away,’ says he, ‘ these birds (ornithas) from us ? ’ And again : ‘ She has at last shooed away the birds (ornis) with difficulty.’ Cratinus uses the term ornithia (birdlings) thus in Nemesis ^g : ‘ All the other birdlings.’ Of the male bird we have not only the accusative form ornin, but also ornitha. The same Cratinus in the same play : ‘ A red-winged bird ’ (ornitha). ^h And again ⁱ :

Strattis in Keeping Cool ^a: 'All the hens and sucking-pigs are dead, and the little birds (ornithia) as well.' Anaxandrides in Tereus ^b: 'They like to watch the boars copulating, and the hens when they are covered.' Now that I have mentioned this comedian, and know that his play, Tereus, is not rated among the best, I am going to quote for your opinion, my friends, what Chamaeleon of Heracleia says in the sixth book of his work On Comedy. He writes as follows ^c: 'Once when Anaxandrides was producing a dithyramb at Athens, he entered the theatre on horseback and recited something from the song. He was fine-looking and tall, affected long hair, and wore a purple cloak with golden hem. Being of a morose disposition, he used to do this with his comedies: whenever he failed to win, he took and gave them to the dealers in frankincense to chop up with it, and he never revised them, as most writers did. In this way he destroyed many plays which had been elaborately composed, because his old age made him peevish towards the spectators.' It is said that he was Rhodian-born, from Camirus. Therefore I wonder how the Tereus survived, since it did not win a victory, and other plays of the same author which had a similar fate. Theopompus, in The Peace, also used the word alectryon of the female bird when he said ^d: 'I am grieved at the loss of my hen, that laid very nice eggs.' And Aristophanes in Daedalus ^e: 'She has laid a very large egg, like a hen.' And again : ' Many a hen, whether she will or no, lays wind-eggs often.' And in The Clouds, when the old man is being instructed in the proper distinction of terms, he says ^a : ' STREPS. Well, now, how am I to call it ? SOCRATES. Call this a fowless, but the other a fowl.' By this he means a hen and a cock. Simonides said ^b : ' Thou cock with lovely song.' Cratinus in The Seasons ^c : ' Like the Persian cock whose whole-voiced note rings out at all hours.' It is spoken of in this way because it wakes us up from our bed. The Dorians use the nominative ornix, and pronounce the genitive, ornichos, ^d with ch. Yet Alcman shows the nominative in s ^e : ' The sea-purple bird (ornis) of spring,' even with the genitive in ch ^f : ' I know the melodies of all birds ' (ornichôn).''

The Shoat.—Epicharmus thus calls the male pig (delphax) in Odysseus the Runaway ^g : " While I had charge of my neighbours' shoat at the Eleusinia I lost it in some mysterious way, not willingly ; and so he said that I was trading in these wares with the Achaeans, and he swore that I had played false with that shoat." Anaxilas also, in Circe, uses the word delphax as a masculine, but applies the name to the adult hog, saying ^a: "Some of you she will turn into mountain-ranging, forest-roving shoats, others into panthers, others into savage wolves or lions." But Aristophanes applies the word to female pigs in Masters of the Frying-pan ^b: "Or the paunch of a shoat killed in the autumn." Also in The Acharnians ^c: "That's because she is too young; but when she is grown to the size of a shoat, she will have a tail that is large and thick and red. So if you will but feed her, you will, I'm sure, have in her a nice pig." So Eupolis in The Golden Age.^d Hipponax also had its feminine ^e: "Like an Ephesian shoat." Properly, only the females would be so called (delphakes), as having wombs (delphyas), since the uterus is called by that name, and the word for brothers (adelphoi) is derived from it. Concerning the age of the animal, Cratinus says in The Archilochuses ^f: "Already shoats, but pigs in the eyes of all the others." Now Aristophanes the grammarian says in the book On Ages ^g: "As to swine, those whose growth has already been reached are shoats (delphakes), but the tender, juicy ones are pigs." Thus the Homeric expression ^h becomes clear: "What the slaves have at hand—flesh of sucking-pigs; but the suitors eat the fatted hogs." The comic poet Plato, in The Poet,ⁱ used the word delphax as a masculine: "He led away the shoat in silence." There was an old law, according to Androtion,^j that in order to ensure the increase of domestic animals they should not sacrifice a sheep that had not been shorn, or that had not had a lamb ; hence they used to eat only the adult animals ; “ but the suitors eat the fatted hogs.” So to-day, also, it is the custom that the priestess of Athena shall not sacrifice a ewe lamb or taste of cheese. At one time, also, when there was a dearth of cows, according to Philochorus,^a a law was passed, on account of the scarcity, that they should abstain from these animals, since they wished to amass them and fill up their numbers by not slaughtering them. The female pig is called choiros by the Ionians, as in Hipponax^b : “ With libation and entrails of a wild pig.” And Sophocles in The Epitaenarians ^c : “ Therefore guard it like a dun pig on a rope.” But King Ptolemy of Egypt, in the ninth book of his Reminiscences, says ^d : “ When I journeyed to Assus, the people there offered me a pig (choiros) which was two and one-half cubits high, with a length which exactly accorded with that height, and snow-white in colour. They said, too, that King Eumenes bought such creatures expressly from them, paying four thousand drachmas for one.” Aeschylus says ^e : “ And I will place this well-suckled pig in a roaring oven. For what dish could be better for a man than that ? ” And again ^e : “ White, of course, and nicely singed is the pig. Cook yourself, pig, and don't be bothered by a little fire!" Still again^a: "I have sacrificed this pig, from the same sow that has done me much mischief in the house by romping about and turning things pêle-mêle up and down." These examples were cited by Chamaeleon in his work On Aeschylus.^b

Speaking of hogs: that the animal is sacred among the Cretans, Agathocles of Babylon, in his book On Cyzicus,^c shows thus: "In Crete they tell the story that the birth of Zeus occurred on Mount Dicte, where there is a secret rite. For it is said that a sow offered suck to Zeus, and as she roved about, she, by her own grunting, caused the infant's whimpering to be inaudible to the passers-by. Hence this creature is universally regarded with great reverence, and no one, Agathocles says, would eat of its flesh. The people of Praesus even offer sacrifices to the pig, and this rite is regularly observed by them before the marriage ceremony." A similar narrative is given by Neanthes of Cyzicus in the second book of his work On Ritual of Initiation.^d Achaëus of Eretria mentions full-grown sows, which he calls petalides, in the satyric drama Aethon,^e thus: "Full oft did I hear full-grown sows . . . in these shapes."^f He calls them petalides, transferring the term from calves; for these are called petaloi (spreading) when their horns are outspread. Achaeus, Eratosthenes also, in Anterinys, called ^a hogs larinoi (fatted), transferring the term, in this case also, from "larinoi cattle"; these were so called either from the verb larineuesthai, which means to be fattened—Sophron ^b: "The cattle are being fattened"—or from a village Larina in Epeirus, or from the cattle-tender; he was named Larinus.

Once a shoat was brought in for us, one half of which had been carefully prepared as a roast, while the other half was soft as though it had been boiled in water, and all of us admired the skill of the chef. He, with great pride in his art, said: "But, let me tell you, not one of you can show where his throat was cut, or how his belly has been stuffed with all sorts of goodies. For he has thrushes inside him, as well as other small birds; portions of pork paunches, cuts from the matrix, yolks of eggs, and also birds' 'bellies, matrix and all, and full of lovely sauces' ^c; also the stuffing of meats grated into fine bits and concocted with pepper; I describe it thus because 'I am ashamed to mention' ^d hash ^e before Ulpian, although I know that he likes to eat it. Yet my own authority, Paxamus, mentions ^f hash, and I don't bother about Attic usage. Do you, then, show me how the pig's throat was cut, and how it comes to be roasted on one half but boiled on the other." While, therefore, we were still trying to find out, the chef continued: "Do you really think that I am less well trained than the famous cooks of old mentioned by the comic poets? Take Poseidippus, for example, in Dancing-girls.^a There a cook has these words to say to his pupils: 'My pupil Leucon, and all you fellow-assistants! Every place is suitable for talking about one's profession; of all possible seasonings, effrontery^b is the best in the art of cookery. In fact in all the arts you will see this generally taking the lead. Here, for example, is a captain of free lances, who wears a coat of mail with scale armour, or carries a dragon-standard wrought in iron; he seemed a Briareos, but if it comes to an issue, he is a hare. Now if the cook enters with a train of underlings and pupils into the house of a common citizen, and calls everybody a skinflint or starveling, everyone soon cowers before him. But if you show yourself merely as you are, you will find yourself thoroughly trimmed when you depart. To repeat, then, what I admonished you, let yourself go in boastful pretence, and study the mouths of the guests. It's like steering into the harbour of a great market; this is the finishing touch to our art,^c if you can run safely into the harbour's mouth. To-day we are serving a wedding-feast; the animal to be slaughtered is an ox. The father of the bride is distinguished, distinguished too is the groom. The women of this company are priestesses to goddess and to god; there will be drunken revellers, pipes playing, all-night vigils, a riot. This is the course your cook's art must run. So remember that !' And concerning another cook (his name is Seuthes), the same poet says ^a : ' Seuthes is just a big private soldier in their eyes ? Don't you know, my friend, that he is evidently not a whit different from a good general ? The enemy are upon him ; the general of profound genius stands his ground and receives the attack. The whole drinking rabble is his foe. It moves its forces on in a body ; it has entered after waiting for fifteen days in expectation of the dinner ; it is full of desire, all aflame, waiting for the moment when things will be brought within its reach. Study with care the massed surge of a mob like that.'

" Listen now to the advice given by the cook in Euphron's Comrades ^b : ' Whenever you serve members of a club, Carion, you must not play any tricks or do the things which you have learned. Yesterday you took too many risks ; there wasn't a single goby, in fact, that had a liver in it ; they were all empty. The calf's brains were purloined. ^c No, Carion, when you go to serve that kind of rabble, a Dromon or a Cerdon, or a Soterides, ^d who pay you all that you demand, you've got to be unqualifiedly honest ; but where we are going to-day to prepare the wedding-feast, you must be blood-thirsty. “ A mighty sophist, too, and one not to be beaten even by physicians in boastfulness, is the cook who appears in The False Accuser of Sosipater^a saying : ‘ A. This profession of ours is not to be altogether despised if you study it carefully, Demylus ; but to-day the business is washed out,^b and they all say they are cooks when they know nothing about it. Through such persons our profession loses its reputation. For, once you get a genuine cook, rightly inducted from childhood into the business, one who grasps the possibilities of the profession and knows all the subjects of our curriculum from a to z, the business will perhaps take on a quite different appearance in your eyes. There are only three of us left to-day, Boidion, Chariades, and myself. You may snap your fingers at the rest. DEM. You mean it ? A. I ? I tell you that we alone preserve the school of Sicon. He was the founder of the art. He taught us, first, to practise astrology ; to follow that up immediately by architecture. He had by heart all the treatises on nature. Capping it all, he used to say, came the science of strategy. Before we studied the art itself he was eager that we should learn these subjects. DEM. You’re like to tire me out, dear friend, aren’t you ? A. No, but while my slave is coming up from market, I'm going to put you through a little examination on the business, that we may seize a good opportunity for talking. DEM. Heavens, this is getting tiresome ! A. Listen, good sir. The cook must know, first and foremost, all about the heavenly bodies, the setting of the stars, their risings, when the sun reaches the long day and returns again to the short day, and in what part of the Zodiac he is. For all our dishes^a and foods virtually take on a flavour that is different at different times, in the revolution of the universal system. The man, then, who has grasped these facts sees the proper time and will make use as he should of all his materials. But he who is ignorant of them naturally gets mired. Again, you must have wondered, perhaps, what architecture can contribute to our profession. DEM. I must have wondered ? A. Yes ; still, I will tell you. To lay out the kitchen correctly, to have it receive all the light it should, to understand where the draft of air comes from, have great importance in promoting the business. Whether the smoke is carried this way or the other is apt to make some difference to the dishes. What next ? I will now explain the strategic elements. . . . There I have the true cook, at least. Order is a wise thing everywhere and in every art, but in ours it practically takes command. For to serve and then remove each course in order and to understand the proper time for them, when to lead

"Again, the cook in The Milesians of Alexis is not far removed from this one when he says ^a: 'A. What do you mean by that? I, too, who am a stranger to these things, should learn. A. Your cook simply has to prepare the dish nicely—nothing else. Now if the man who is to eat and judge happen to arrive at the right time, he does his part in furthering the art. But if he comes later than the appointed moment, so that the cook must warm up again what he has roasted before, or must finish too quickly the preparation of what he has not roasted yet, the guest robs the art of its pleasure. spring up lightly to the sky ; for them alone some invisible law of necessity has bound together their birth and their passing from life in the self-same instant.'

" Now Euphron, whom I mentioned a little while ago, Judges (for I should not hesitate to call you judges,^a while I await the judgement of your senses), has portrayed a cook in his play, Brothers, who is erudite and well-educated, and who mentions the artists before his own day ; he tells what special excellence each one possessed, and wherein he showed to advantage over the others ; nevertheless he has mentioned none possessing the qualities of those whom I, as it chances, have often brought to your notice. However, this is what he says^b : ' Though I have had many pupils, Lycus, you, because of your constant good sense and spirit,^c depart from my house a perfect cook, made so in less than ten months, and much the youngest of them all. Agis of Rhodes was the only one who could bake a fish to perfection ; Nereus of Chios could boil a conger to suit the gods ; Chariades, who came from Athens, could make an egg mosaic with white sauce ; black broth began to exist with Lamprias first, Aphthonetus cooked sausages, Euthynus lentil-soup, Aristion gilt-heads for club assemblies.^d After the famous sophists of old, these men have become our second group of Seven Sages. As for myself, seeing that most specialities were preëmpted, I was the first to invent thieving in such a way that nobody dislikes me for that, but they all hire me. Then, when you saw that this had been preëmpted by me, you added an invention of your own, and that is yours. Four days ago the Tenians were offering sacrifice: people a-plenty present, who had sailed the salt sea long. The victim was a kid, thin and tiny. "No meat was to be taken away" ^a on that occasion for Lycus or his teacher.^b You made them produce two more kids; for while they were looking intently at the liver,^c you lowered one hand secretly and tossed the kidney quickly into the cistern. Then you raised a big hullabaloo. "It hasn't any kidney!" they cried. The Tenians there poked about to find the missing member. So they slaughtered another kid. Again, as I saw, you gulped down the heart of this second one.^d You have long been a great man, be sure of that. You alone have discovered the art, how not to be a wolf^e vainly gaping. Yesterday you chucked two spits of entrails, lightly balanced, into the fire to put out the blaze before they were cooked, and kept whistling to the accompaniment of this two-stringed lyre.^f I saw you! The other trick was a tragedy, but this was a vaudeville skit.'

"It isn't possible, is it, that anyone of this second group of Seven Sages, so named, devised anything

^a So that a third kid was required.

^e His name was Lycus, "wolf." Theocritus makes the same pun, xiv. 22 ff. Cf. Aristænetus: λύκος χανών, ὦ Λύκων, ἀπιθι διὰ κενῆς.

^f Text and meaning are very doubtful. See critical note. He evidently puns on the two senses of χορδή, "entrail" and "harp-string." The two spits were so carelessly supported that he easily dropped them into the fire, from which he purloined the entrails on them for his own use. The whistling to string-accompaniment is compared to a single act in vaudeville, while the exploit with three kids was a long drama.

so wonderful as this with a pig,^a how it could be stuffed with these things inside it, and having one part of it roasted, the other boiled, while it showed, itself, no sign of being cut? ” When, therefore, we begged and entreated him to explain his skill, he replied: “ I won’t tell you this year, ‘ by the men who faced danger at Marathon, or, what is more, by those who fought the sea-fight at Salamis.’ ” ^b So we all agreed, because of an oath as strong as that, not to force the fellow, but to lay hands on something else among the viands passed round. And Ulpian said: “ ‘ By the men who faced danger at Artemisium,’ ^b nobody shall taste anything before I am told where that word ‘ passed round ’ ^c is used. For I am the sole authority on light luncheons (geumata). ” ^d And Magnus said: “ Aristophanes says in The Rehearsal ^e: ‘ Why haven’t you ordered the cups to be passed round? ’ But Sophron, in Mimes of Women, has used the word in the more extended sense ^f: ‘ Hand me the bowl full, Booby! ’ Plato, too, said in The Laconians ^g: ‘ Let him hand me all the cups.’ Alexis in Pamphila ^h: ‘ He placed the table beside us, and then, handing us cartloads of goodies. . . .’ Now as to the ‘ tastes ’ (geumata) which you pledged to yourself in your toast, Ulpian, it is high time to explain that to you. For we have the verb geuo (taste) in The Goats of Eupolis ⁱ: ‘ Take and taste this now.’ ” Then Ulpian said: “ Ephippus in The

Upon this the cook spoke: “‘So, then, I will tell of a device not old,’^c but my own invention. Not that I want the flute-player to get a beating; for Eubulus said in The Laconians or Leda^d: ‘But we once heard at home this—the goddess of the hearth be my witness!—that for all the mistakes made by the cook, the flute-player, as the saying goes, gets a beating in our house.’ Philyllius, too, or whoever wrote The Island-towns, says^e: ‘Whatever wrong a cook happens to commit, for that the flute-player gets a beating.’ Well, as to my invention of the stuffed pig which is half-roasted, half-boiled, and shows no cut: the pig was killed by a short incision under the shoulder.” Thereupon he showed us. “Then, after most of the blood had flowed out, I carefully washed with wine, many times, all the insides along with the offal (yes, for the word offal is used, ye babbling Dinnervillians^f), and I hung the pig up by the feet. Then I soaked it again in wine, and after a preliminary boiling I crammed the aforesaid tid-bits, with a lot of pepper, through its mouth, pouring on them abundance of gravy very nicely made.^a And after that I plastered half of the pig, as you can see, with a lot of barley meal, having made a batter of it with wine and olive oil. Then I set it in an oven, placing under it a bronze tray ; and so I roasted it at the fire in such a way as not to scorch it, nor yet have it underdone when taken off. After the skin had been crisply roasted I guessed that the remaining part of the animal was done, so I removed the barley meal from it and brought it in and served it to you. As for the word ' offal,' my good Ulpian, the comic poet Dionysius in his play, Namesakes, represents a cook conversing with his pupils, and he says ^b : ' Come now, Dromon, whatever cunning, clever, or subtle trick you know in your profession, bring it to light for the benefit of your teacher. To-day I demand of you an exhibition of your skill. I am taking you into the enemy's country ; charge right in without fear. They give out the cuts of meat carefully counted, and they keep their eyes on you. Boil the cuts well and make them tender, and mix up the count as I have told you. They are going to have a fine large fish ; the inwards are yours. And if you can dislodge a nice slice from it, that also is yours so long as we are in the house ; once outdoors, it is mine. As for the offal and other accompaniments which by their nature can't be counted or tested, but which have only the rank or station of mince-

So we all applauded the cook for his ready speech and the ingenuity of his art. Then our noble host, Larensis, spoke up: "How much better it is that our cooks should learn such things as these, rather than the things they learn at the house of a certain compatriot of ours! He, puffed up with wealth and luxury, used to compel the cooks to learn the dialogues of the most admirable Plato, and, as they brought in the dishes, to say^b: 'One, two, three; but where, my dear Timaeus, is he who was the fourth among our guests of yesterday, who to-day are our hosts?' Then another answered: 'Some illness has fallen upon him, Socrates.' And so the slaves would go through with most of the dialogue in this manner. The result was that the feasters were bored, and that pedantic fellow was insulted every day, and for that reason many men of nice taste solemnly declined to attend the entertainments at his house. These cooks of ours, on the other hand, when they learn the things they do, perhaps afford you at the same time no little delight." And the slave, after being applauded for his skill in cookery, said: "What have my predecessors discovered or declaimed that is like what I have done? Or may I weigh myself against ordinary cooks without boasting too highly of my own success ? And yet, even the first man to tie on the wreath of victory at the Olympic contest, Coroebus of Elis, was a cook, and he did not puff himself up over his art so much as did the cook in Straton's Phoenicides, of whom the man who hired him says the following ^a : ' I have taken into my house a male Sphinx, ^b not a cook. Really, I understand absolutely not one thing, the gods are my witnesses, of all that he says. He has come with a stock of strange expressions. For the moment he entered he looked at me and loudly asked, "How many articulates ^c have you invited to dinner ? Tell me." "I have invited Articulates to dinner ? You're mad ! Think you that I am acquainted with these Articulates ? Not one of them is coming. That, by Zeus, is really the last straw—inviting Articulates to dinner !" "And so there is going to be no Epulator ^d present at all ?" "Epulator ? No, at least I think not." I began to count up. There'll be Philinus, Moschion, Niceratus, Mr. What's-his-name, and Mr. Thingumbob. I ran over them all by name. I couldn't find even one named Epulator. "No," I said ; "no Epulator will be here." "What do you mean ? Not even one ?" He became very indignant, as if he were wronged because I hadn't invited an Epulator. It was very strange. "Are you, then slaughtering a ' voracious ^e swine ' ? "

^b i.e., one who speaks in riddles.

^c The Homeric μέρορες, sc. βροτοί, "articulate-speaking," was used in the poets for "mortals," "men." The master takes this and the following for proper names.

^a Using for sheep the poetic word μῆλα.

^b The prose word is προβάτιον.

“No,” I replied. “Nor ‘broad-browed beef’?”
 “I’m not slaughtering a beef, you poor fool.” “Perchance you have an oblation of mutton^a?” “Not I, by Zeus, neither one of them; I’m killing a sheep.^b”
 “Well, then,” said he, “is not mutton sheep?”
 “Mutton sheep? I don’t take you at all; I don’t know any of these things and I don’t want to. I am too countrified. So talk to me simply.” “Don’t you know that Homer used these words?” “He might have used whatever he wanted to, cook, for all I care. But what has that to do with us, in the name of Hestia?” “Do thou now, as Homer would say, give heed to what I still have to tell.” “So you really mean to kill me in Homeric fashion?” “That’s my way of talking.” “Well, don’t talk in that way when you are in my house.” “What, for your paltry four shillings, I am to throw away,” says he, “my scholastic principles? Hand me the sacrificial groats.” “What’s that?” “The barley.” “Why, then, you paralytic, do you talk in tangled circumlocutions^c?” “Have you any precipitate^d?” “Precipitate! Get you into a bagnio, won’t you, and speak out more plainly what you want to say to me.” “Unrecking of thy words^e art thou, old man,” says he; “hand me the salt!” “So that is a precipitate?” “Now show me the lustral water.” It came. He slaughtered and kept on saying other words of such a nature that nobody, by Mother Earth, could have understood them: cuttings,^f portions, double-folds, spits.

^a See 459 a.

^d Meaning salt, precipitated from sea water.

^e He uses again a Homeric word, ἀτάσθαλος (Athen. 12 d and note c), with reference to the insulting οὐχὶ λαικάσει above.

As a matter of fact, the great majority of cooks have inquiring minds in matters of history and the use of words. The most learned among them, at any rate, say " the knee is nearer than the shin,"^a and " I have traversed Asia and Europe." When criticizing someone they say he must not turn Oeneus into Peleus.^b I have myself looked with admiration upon one cook of old by whose device, invented by him, I have profited by personal experience. Alexis introduces him in The Cauldron,^c saying : " A. He cooked, I thought, a dish of stewed pork. GL. That's nice, certainly. A. But then he scorched it. GL. Don't worry ; for that accident is easily remedied. A. How ? GL. Just take some vinegar, pour it cold into a shallow pan, you understand, then put the pot, when still warm, into the vinegar ; for if the pot is still hot, it will draw the moisture through itself, and in this ferment it will take on porous passages through it, like pumice, and through these will absorb the moisture. And so the pieces of meat will not be completely dried up, but will be nice and savoury, and of moist condition. A. Apollo ! No physician could cure better. Glaucias, I will do that very thing.

You're a much better speech-writer, as it now turns out, than cook. What you say you unsay. You bring your art into disrepute." And now enough of cooks, gentlemen of Dinnerville; for I fear that one of them may take umbrage and bawl these words from Menander's Peevish Man^b: "Not a single person has ever escaped scot-free after he wronged a cook. Our profession is somehow sacrosanct." But I, in the words of sweetest Diphilus,^c "serve you with a sheep integral, folded and skewered in the middle, stuffed with dressing, and little pigs roasted entire with their skins on; having done that, I now bring on a goose so puffed out with stuffing that it is like the wooden horse."^d

The Goose.—These, as well as other birds, were brought in elaborately dressed. And someone said, "The geese are fatted." Then Ulpian asked, "In what author is 'the fatted goose' found?" Plutarch answered him: "Theopompus of Chios, in his History of Greece, and in the thirteenth book of his History of Philip,^e said that when Agesilaus of Lacedaemon arrived in Egypt, the Egyptians sent him fattened geese and calves. And the comic poet Epigenes says in The Bacchae^a: 'But supposing that someone took and stuffed him up for me like a fattened goose.' And Archestratus in his famous poem^b: 'And dress the fattened young of a goose with it, roasting that also simply.' Now you, Ulpian, are just the man to tell us, since you are the one who asks all questions of all men, where among ancient writers it is thought worth while to mention those sumptuous goose-livers. For that goose-fatteners are known Cratinus can testify when he says, in Dionysus-Alexander^c: 'Goose-fatteners, cow-tenders.' Homer^d has the word goose both as feminine and as masculine: 'An eagle bearing a white goose.' Also^e: 'As yonder eagle snatched away the goose that was fed in the house.' And^f: 'Twenty geese I have in my house, that eat wheat from the water-trough.' As for goose-livers, which are excessively sought after in Rome, Eubulus mentions them in The Wreath-sellers, saying^g: 'Unless you have the liver or mind of a goose.'

There were also many "half-heads" of shoats. These are mentioned by Crobylus in The False Substitute ^a: "There came in the tender half-head of a shoat. Of that, I swear by Zeus, I didn't leave a bit." Next came the "meat-pot," as it is called. This is composed of meats chopped fine, with the blood and the fat, in sweetened gravy. "Aristophanes the grammarian says ^b that the people of Achaea give it this name." So spoke Myrtilus, and he added: "Anticleides in the eighth book of his Returns ^c says that 'the Chians were once on the point of being massacred at a feast by the Erythraeans as the result of a concerted plot; someone perceived what was on foot and recited: "O ye Chians, since mighty violence has the Erythraeans for its own, flee after ye have feasted on swine's flesh, but stay not for the ox."'" Boiled meat is mentioned by Aristomenes in Quacks ^d thus: . . . They also ate testicles, which they called kidneys; Philippides in The Fountain of Youth, dilating on the gluttony of the courtesan Gnathaena, says ^e: 'Then after all these viands a slave came bearing heaps of testicles. Now all the other females tittered with embarrassment, but that bloodthirsty Gnathaena, with a loud laugh cried out at the same time, "These are indeed fine kidneys, by the dear Demeter." Then she snatched two of them and gulped them down, so that we tumbled on our backs with laughter.' " capon with vinegar-oil^a sauce. Whereupon Ulpian, who is so fond of criticizing others, and who lay on the couch alone, eating but little and watching the speakers, said: "What is vinegar-oil sauce? Unless, to be sure, you are trying to tell us of what we call 'poll-fish' and 'sweet-fish,'^b the viands which are well known in my native land." To which the other said: "The comic poet Timocles mentions vinegar-oil sauce in The Ring,^c saying: 'Dogfish and rays, and all the kinds of fish which are dressed with vinegar-oil sauce.' And some men are called 'oil-tops' by Alexis in The Lovelorn Lass,^d thus: 'Oil-tops they, though the rest of their bodies is wooden.'"^e When a large fish was served once in an oil-pickle, someone said that any fish was very nice if served in an oil pickle; but Ulpian, who likes to collect thorny questions,^e contracted his brows and said: "Where is 'oil-pickle' to be found? As for your word for fish (opsarion ^f), I know that that is not used in any author alive." Now most of the company told him to mind his own business, and went on eating; but Cynulcus shouted the lines from The Breezes of Metagenes^g: "Nay, my good sir, let us dine first, and after that you may ask me anything you like; for just now I am hungry, and somehow have an awfully poor memory." And Myrtilus spoke up quite sweetly, enlisting in Ulpian's cause, that he might not have a share in any food, but might spend all his time in talking; so he said:

Another speaker remarked that a very nice dish was

For he says in Atthis ^c: 'The first man who said that no one was a real professor of wisdom if he ate any live creature was certainly wise himself. Take me, for instance; I have just returned without buying anything that was alive. I bought large fish, but they were dead; boiled slices of fat lamb, but not living; for it can't be done! What else? Oh, yes; I also bought a baked liver. If anyone can show that one of these things has voice or breath, I admit I've done wrong and am transgressing the law.' This being so, do allow us to dine. For look! While I have been talking to you the pheasants also have sailed in alongside, looking on us with contempt because of your unseasonable loquacity." "But if you will tell me, Master Myrtilus," said Ulpian, "where your word 'finding-happiness-in-the-belly' comes from, and whether any of the ancients mentions Phasian birds, I, in my turn, without 'sailing at break of day over the Hellespont,'^d will go to the market-place and buy a pheasant, which I will eat up with you." He says ^a: 'You fat-licking Eurybatus, . . . you must be one who finds happiness in his belly.' And 'Phasian bird' (pheasant) is mentioned by the most delightful Aristophanes in a play, The Birds. Two old men of Athens, impelled by love of quiet, are seeking a quiet city in which to settle. Life among the birds appeals to them. So they go to the home of the birds, and suddenly one bird of ferocious aspect flies toward them. They are scared, but try to encourage each other, saying, among other things ^b: 'A. But this fellow here, what bird is he? Won't you answer? B. You mean me? I am Shitepoke, a Phasian.'^c Again, the term Phasian used in The Clouds I, at least, understand to refer to birds and not to horses, as many authorities do ^d: 'The Phasians kept by Leogoras.' For Leogoras may have kept Phasian birds as well as horses. Leogoras, in fact, is satirized as a glutton by Plato in Very Sad.^e And Mnesimachus (he too is one of the poets of the Middle Comedy) says in Philip ^f: 'And as the saying goes, birds' milk is scarcer, or a nicely plucked pheasant.' Theophrastus of Eresus, Aristotle's disciple, mentions them in the third book of his work On Animals, and says something like this ^g: 'Birds also are distinguished in classes in this way. There are first the heavy and non-flying, like the francolin, partridge, cock, pheasant, able to walk and covered with plumage as soon as hatched.' And Aristotle in the eighth book of his History of Animals writes as follows ^a: 'Among the birds, some are given to dusting themselves, others to bathing, while others neither dust nor bathe. All that are non-flying, but keep to the ground, like to dust themselves, such as the hen, partridge, francolin, pheasant, and crested lark.' Speusippus also mentions the pheasant in the second book of *Similar*s. All these authorities call it phasianos and not phasianikos. Agatharchides of Cnidus, discussing the Phasis river in the thirty-fourth book of his European History, writes this also ^b: 'Innumerable birds, of the sort called pheasants, resort for food to the mouths of the river.' And Callixeinus of Rhodes, in the fourth book of his Alexandria, when describing the parade that occurred in Alexandria under King Ptolemy, called Philadelphus, writes the following of these birds, which he evidently regarded as a great marvel ^c: 'Then were brought, in cages, parrots, peacocks, guinea-fowls, birds from the Phasis and from Aethiopia in great quantities.' Artemidorus, the Aristophanean, ^d in his Glossary of Cookery, and Pamphilus of Alexandria, in his Onomasticon and Glossary, cite Epaenetus as saying, in his Art of Cookery, that the Phasian bird is called tatyras. But Ptolemy Euergetes, in the second book of his Commentaries, says ^e that the name of the Phasian bird is tetasos.

The Francolin.^b—Aristophanes in The Storks^c: “The francolin, sweetest meat to cook at the feast of victory.”^d Alexander of Myndus says^e that it is a little larger than a partridge, entirely covered with variegated markings on its back, of clay colour tending to red. It can be caught by hunters because of its weight and the shortness of its wings. It likes to roll in the dust, is prolific, and feeds on seeds.^f And Socrates, in the work On Boundaries,^g Places, Fire, and Stones, says: “When the francolins were transported from Lydia to Egypt and let loose in the woods, they uttered for a time the note of a quail; but ever since a famine occurred as the result of the river flowing too low,^h and many of the inhabitants died, the birds have not ceased to this very day to utter, more plainly than children who speak most distinctly could, the words ‘three times evil to evil-doers.' If they are caught they not only cannot be tamed, but they do not even utter a note any more. If released, they become vocal again." Hipponax mentions them thus ^a: "Eating not of francolins or hares." Also Aristophanes in The Birds ^b; in The Acharnians, too, he speaks of them as being abundant in the Megarian territory. ^c Attic writers place the circumflex on the last syllable of the name (attagâs), contrary to right analogy. For words of more than two syllables ending in as with a long, when the penult contains a, are barytone; thus, akâmas (untiring), Sacâdas, adâmas (adamant). Further, in the plural one should say attagai and not attagênes.

The Purple Coot.—It is well known that Aristophanes mentions this bird also. ^d Polemon, in the fifth book of his Address to Antigonus and Adaeus, says ^e of the purple coot that when it is domesticated the bird keeps a sharp eye on married women and is so affected if the wife commits adultery that when it suspects this it ends its life by strangling and so gives warning to its master. Polemon adds that the bird does not take food until it has walked round and found a spot suitable to itself; after doing this it rolls in the dust and bathes, and then only does it feed. Aristotle says ^f that it has parted toes, ^g a bluish colour, long legs, a beak which is red all the way from the head; it is of the size of the cock, but has a small gullet, hence it grasps its food with its feet and breaks it up into small bits; it drinks, however, in gulps. It has five toes, the middle being the largest. Alexander of Myndus in the second book of Inquiry into Birds says that this bird is Libyan and sacred to the gods which are worshipped in Libya.

The Redbird.—Callimachus, in his treatise On Birds, says ^a that the purple coot (porphyriôn) is distinct from the redbird (porphyris), classifying each separately; he further says that the purple coot eats its food burrowing in a dark place, that no one may observe it. For it hates those who approach its food. The redbird is mentioned also by Aristophanes in The Birds.^b Ibycus gives the name of “hiding-red” to certain birds in these lines ^c: “Here, on the topmost boughs, perch speckled guans, and hiding-redbirds with necks of sheen, and long-winged halcyons.” And in other lines he says ^d: “. . . me ever, O heart of mine, as when a long-winged redbird . . .”

The Partridge.—These are mentioned by many authors, including also Aristophanes. Some shorten the middle syllable in the word; thus Archilochus ^e: “Like a partridge (perdika) cowering from fear.” Similarly also in ortýga (quail) and choinika (quart), although lengthening the syllable is very common in Attic writers. Sophocles in The Camicians ^f: “There came one who bore the name of the partridge-bird (perdikos) on the glorious hills of Athens.”

Nicophon in Hand-to-mouth-toilers^e: "The boiled small fry and those partridges yonder." Epicharmus makes the penult short in Revellers^f: "They brought cuttlefish a-swimming and partridges (perdikas) on the wing." Aristotle says of this creature^g: "The partridge lives on land and has parted toes; it lives for fifteen years, but the female may live even longer. For in the case of birds the females are more long-lived than the males. It sits on its eggs and hatches them out just as the hen does. When it becomes aware that it is being hunted, it proceeds away from the nest and hobbles along near the hunter's legs, exciting hopes of being caught, and so deceives him until the young have flown away, when it also flies out of reach. The creature is malicious and mischievous, also salacious. Hence it crushes the female's eggs in order to gratify its desires. The female, becoming aware of this, runs away and lays its eggs." The same facts are recorded by Callimachus also in his work On Birds.^f Those which have no mates fight against each other, and the one that is defeated is forced to mate with the victor. all the males mate in turn with the defeated bird. Even the tame birds mate with the wild. When one bird is beaten by the second, it is mated by the victor in secret. This happens at a certain season of the year, as Alexander of Myndus also declares. Males and females nest on the ground, each in a separate place. Against a decoy partridge the leader of the wild birds forces his way to fight him; if the leader is beaten another comes up to fight. Now when the decoy bird is a male, this is their procedure; but when the decoy is a female, she sings until the leader comes to meet her. The other birds gather and try to chase him away from the female because he pays attention to her instead of to them. Hence it often happens, for this reason, that he approaches her silently, that no other bird may hear his call and come to fight him. Sometimes the female puts the male to silence when he approaches her. Often, too, it rises from the nest where it is brooding, whenever it sees her male approaching the decoy, and even submits to copulation in order to draw him away from the decoy. Partridges and quails are excited to such a degree over the act of copulation that they throw themselves among the decoy birds, alighting upon their heads. They even say that the female partridges, which are led as decoys to the hunt, the moment they catch sight or smell of the males standing or flying about to windward of them, become pregnant, and some even lay immediately. And so, at the season of mating, they fly about with beak open and with tongue projecting, the females as well as the males. Clearchus says in the essay On Panic ^a: "Sparrows, partridges, cocks also, and quails emit semen not merely if they see the females, but even if they hear their call. The cause of this is the imaginative thought of union arising in their consciousness. This becomes most obvious at the season of mating, when you place a mirror directly in their path; for, deceived by the reflection, they run up to it and so are caught; they then emit semen—all, that is, excepting the barn-yard fowls. The latter are simply provoked to fight by the sight of the reflection." So much, then, for what Clearchus says.

Partridges are called caccabae by some writers, as, for example, Alcman when he says ^b: "Epic verses, indeed, and lyric melody full-tongued hath Alcman invented, composing the notes of the partridge (caccabis)," thus clearly indicating that he learned to sing from the partridges. Hence also Chamaeleon of Pontus has said ^c: "The men of old devised the invention of music from the birds singing in solitary places; by way of imitating them, men instituted the art of music." But not all partridges, he adds, utter the note caccabê; Theophrastus, at any rate, in the chapter On the Difference in Voice among Congeners, says ^d that "the partridges of Athens found on this side of Corydallus, in the direction of the city, cry caccabê, but those on the other side cry tittybê." ^e Basilis, in the second book of the History of India, says^a that "the dwarfs, who continually wage war with the cranes, use partridges as mounts to ride upon." But Menecles, in the first part of his Collection, says^b that "the Pygmies wage war on the partridges and the cranes." There is another kind of partridge in Italy with dark plumage and smaller in build, having a beak not of vermilion colour. The partridges from the neighbourhood of Cirrha have a flesh which is uneatable on account of their food. Those of Boeotia either do not cross over into Attica, or if they do, they become recognizable by their note, as we have said before.^c The partridges that are found in Paphlagonia, says Theophrastus,^d have two hearts; those on the island of Sciathos eat snails. Partridges sometimes lay as many as fifteen or even sixteen eggs. They can fly only a short distance, as Xenophon says in the first book of his Anabasis, writing as follows^e: "As for the bustards, if one starts them up suddenly it is possible to catch them; for they can fly only a short distance, like partridges, and they soon get tired. But their flesh is of good flavour."

Plutarch says that Xenophon is quite right about the bustards. For these creatures are brought in very large numbers to Alexandria from Libya, which is adjacent, and the mode of catching them is this. This creature, the ôtus,^f is given to mimicry, particularly of anything which it sees a man doing. At any rate, it does the same things that it sees the hunters doing. So the hunters take a position in plain sight of the birds and smear their eyes with an unguent after preparing other unguents which

^b The word is apparently made like λαγῶπους (hare-foot), a kind of grouse, from λαγῶς, hare, and so named because of cause eyes and eyelids to stick together ; these they place at no great distance from themselves in small pans. The bustards, therefore, seeing the men smearing themselves, take the unguent from the pans and do the same thing, and are quickly caught. Aristotle writes thus concerning them ^a : “ It belongs to the class of migrating birds, and of those which have parted toes and are three-toed ; in size like a large rooster ; coloured like a quail, head elongated, beak sharp, neck slender, eyes large, tongue bony ; it has no crop.” Alexander of Myndus says that it is also called lagodias.^b They say that it chews the cud and takes delight in a horse.^c If, at any rate, one should put on a horse’s hide, he would catch as many as he likes. For they will come close. In another passage, again, Aristotle says ^d : “ The otus is like the owl, but is not nocturnal. It has horns at the ears (ota), whence its name, otus ; it has the size of a pigeon, and imitates human beings ; when it dances, at any rate, in imitation of man, it can be caught.” It looks like a man in its features, and is imitative of everything that a man does. This is why persons who are easily deceived on any chance occasion are called owls by the comedians.^e In catching owls, at any rate, the man who is most adept dances after he has taken his place where they can see him, and the creatures, looking at the dancer, move like mario-the feathered feet. Lobeck’s λαγωπίας would refer to its large eyes.

nettes. Another hunter, taking his station behind them, catches them when rapt in the pleasure of mimicry before they know it. They say that the horned owls ^a also do the same thing ^b; for it is common report that they are caught by dancing. Homer mentions them.^c A kind of dance is called skôps from them, receiving its name from the variety of movements observed in the creature. These owls also delight in mimicry, and from them we give the term skôptein to the copying and hitting off of persons we ridicule, because we practise the method of the owls (skôpes). All birds which have well-developed tongues can also make articulate tones, and can imitate the sounds made by men and by other birds; such are the parrot and the magpie. "Now the horned owl," as Alexander of Myndus says,^d "is smaller than the common owl,^e and upon a ground of lead-colour it has whitish spots; at the brows it bears feathers extending upwards beside each temple." Callimachus says ^f that there are two kinds of horned owls (skôpes), and that the one kind utters notes, the other does not. Hence, he says, the first are called skôpes, the second aeiskôpes; their eyes are glaring.^g Alexander of Myndus says that the word for horned owls in Homer is written without the s (kôpes), and Aristotle has called them by that name.^h These owls ⁱ appear at all seasons and cannot be eaten. But those which appear one or two days in the autumn are edible. They differ from the aeiskôpes in plumpness, and are similar to the turtle-dove and the ringdove. Speusippus, also, in the second book of Similars, gives them the name kôpes, without the s. Epicharmus has ^a: "Horned owls (skôpes), hoopoes, common owls." Metrodorus, again, says in the treatise On Habit that horned owls are caught by their imitation of dancing.

Since, in our account of partridges, we mentioned that they are very much given to copulation, let it be recorded that the bird which is also lustful is the rooster. Aristotle, at any rate, says ^b that when roosters are dedicated in sacred places, those which have been there for some time before cover the one newly dedicated until another bird is dedicated; and if none be dedicated, they fight against one another, and the victor continually covers the vanquished. It is also recorded that a rooster, when entering any door, raises his crest, and that he does not cede to another bird the right to cover without a battle. Theophrastus ^c declares that wild birds are more given to covering than the domestic. He even says that the males are eager to consort as soon as they rise from the nest, the females as the day advances farther. Sparrows, too, are given to copulation; hence Terpsicles says that they who eat sparrows are prone to lust. Perhaps, then, Sappho draws from a fact in nature when she makes Aphrodite ride in a car drawn by sparrows ^d; for the creature is given to "riding," and is prolific. At any rate, the sparrow lays as many as eight eggs, according to Aristotle. ^e Alexander of Myndus says that there are two kinds of sparrows, domestic and wild; the females among them are more insignificant, especially in their beak, which is more hornlike in colour, and they have faces neither very white nor very dark. Aristotle declares ^a that the males disappear in winter, but the females remain through the season; he draws this probable inference from their colour; for he says that this changes, as in the case of blackbirds and coots, which grow white according to the season. The people of Elis call sparrows deiretae,^b as Nicander of Colophon says in the third book of his Glossary.^c

Quails.—The question is raised in general concerning nouns which end in yx, why it is that in the genitive these nouns do not employ the same consonant in forming the last syllable (I mean nouns like onyx, nail, and ortyx, quail). Simple ^d dissyllabic masculines ending in x, when preceded by y,^e and when they have at the beginning of the last syllable one of the unchangeable sounds,^f or one of the sounds characteristic of what is called the first declension of barytone words,^g are inflected in the genitive with k; thus keryx, herald, genitive kerykos; pelyx, axe, pelykos; Eryx, the mountain, Erykos; Bebryx, Bebrykos. But all those which do not have this character are inflected with g: ortyx, quail, genitive ortygos; oryx, pickaxe, orygos^h; kokkyx, cuckoo, kokkygos. Noteworthy is onyx, nail, onychos.^h Furthermore, as a general rule, the genitive singular follows the nominative plural (l, r) and the nasals (m, n); they did not “change” in inflections, as k, g, ch, p, t, th, d, th, and p, b, ph, seemed to do.

^g More lit., “sounds by which (is formed that declension) which is called the first declension of barytones”; but no example of this latter is given.

^h Neither oryx nor onyx conforms to this rule, since they have r and n as the initial sound in the last syllable. To onyx might have been added monyx, “single-hoofed,” which is a compound (cf. preceding note).

and employs the same consonant in forming the last syllable.^a This is also true if the noun is inflected without a consonant.

Aristotle says ^b : “ The quail belongs to the class of migrating birds, and of those which have parted toes ; it does not make a nest, but a rolling-place in the dust ; this it shelters with twigs, on account of the hawks, and here it broods over its eggs.” Alexander of Myndus, in the second book of his work On Animals, says ^c : “ The female quail is slender-necked, and has not the black markings of the male under the chin. When dissected, it is seen not to have a large crop, but it has a large heart, and this has three lobes. It has also the liver and the gall bladder tightly joined in the intestines, a spleen small and difficult to discover, and testicles under the liver, as in the case of roosters.” Respecting their origin, Phanodemus says in the second book of his Attic History ^d : “ When Erysichthon perceived the island of Delos, which was called Ortygia (Quail Island) by the ancients because the flocks of these birds, as they were borne from the sea, settled upon the island, since it offered security . . .” Eudoxus of Cnidus, in the first book of his Description of the Earth, says that the Phoenicians sacrifice quails to Heracles, because Heracles, the son of Asteria and Zeus, went into Libya and was killed by Typhon ; but Iolaus brought a quail to him, and having put it close to him, he smelt it and came to life again. For when he was alive, Eudoxus says, Heracles had delighted in this bird. Eupolis in The Island Towns gives a diminutive form to their name, saying^a: "A. Have you ever at any time kept quails? B. Indeed I have; some tiny little quails (ortygia). And what of it?" Antiphanes in The Farmer has this diminutive in the singular, thus^b: "Why! What then are you able to do, you with the heart of a quail (ortygion)?"^c Pratinas, singularly enough, in The Dymaenae or Caryatids, calls the quail "sweet-voiced"^d; but perhaps among the Phliasians or the Laconians they may be tuneful, as the partridges are. And the designation sialis, says Didymus,^e must be derived from this. For most birds, generally speaking, have their names from their notes. As for the land-rail (mentioned by Cratinus in The Cheirons when he says,^f "That Ithacan land-rail"), Alexander of Myndus says of it that in size it is as large as a turtle-dove, but has long legs, and is of poor growth and cowardly. Concerning quail-hunting, Clearchus of Soli records a singular circumstance in the essay entitled On the Mathematical Passages in Plato's Republic. He says^g: "In the mating season of the quails, if one places a mirror in their path and a noose in front of the mirror, they will run to meet the reflection in the mirror and will be caught in the noose." Clearchus records similar facts of the birds called koloioi (jackdaws) in these words : " So it is also with jackdaws, because of their innate love of their kind. Although they beat everything else in craftiness, nevertheless when a bowl full of oil is set, those of them which stand on the brim and look down cast themselves headlong upon the reflection. Thus their wings become soaked with oil, and being glued together become the cause of their capture."

The middle syllable of the name for quail ^a is prolonged in Attic Greek, just as in doidȳka (pestle) and in kerȳka (herald) ; so Demetrius Ixion states in his treatise On the Alexandrian Dialect. But Aristophanes made it short in The Peace, for the sake of the metre ^b : " Home-bred quails " (ortȳges). The so-called chennia (it is a small quail) are mentioned by Cleomenes in his Letter to Alexander, writing as follows : " Ten thousand smoked coots, five thousand thrushes, ten thousand smoked quails (chennia). " And Hipparchus in The Egyptian Iliad : " And I liked not the life which the Egyptians lead, for ever plucking quails (chennia) and slimy magpies."

Even swans were not often missing at our banquet ; of them Aristotle says ^c : " The swan loves its young, and it is belligerent ; the belligerent, at any rate, is inclined to mutual slaughter. It will even fight the eagle, though it will not provoke the fight. They are also given to song, especially as their end draws near. They even sing while they are crossing the deep sea. It belongs to the class of web-footed and grass-eating birds." But Alexander of Myndus says that, although he has closely followed many dying swans, he never heard them sing. Hegesianax of Alexandria, who composed the work entitled Cephalion's Trojan War, says ^a that the Cynus (Swan) who fought in single combat against Achilles was reared in Leucophrys by the bird whose name he bore. According to Philochorus, Boeus, or Boeô, in the Ornithogony,^b says that Cynus was changed into a bird by Ares, and coming to the Sybaris river he consorted with a crane. He also says that Cynus placed in his nest the grass that is called willow-grass. Boeus says also, of the crane, that she had been a woman eminent among the Pygmies, named Gerana. She, honoured as a god by her citizens, held the true gods in low esteem herself, especially Hera and Artemis. Hera, therefore, became angry, metamorphosed her into a bird of ugly shape, and made her an enemy and hateful to the Pygmies who had honoured her; Boeus also says that from her and Nicodamas was born the land tortoise. The author of this epic records that all the birds without exception had once been human beings.

In Philoctetes,^d declining the word in the genitive (plural), he has phabôn. "Now the rock-dove," Aristotle says, "is larger than the pigeon, and has a winey colour."^e The stock-dove is intermediate between the pigeon and the rock-dove, while the ring-dove is of the size of the cock, with ashy colour; the turtle-dove is smaller than all the others, and has a grey colour. It appears in summer, but during the winter lives in holes. The stock-dove and the pigeon appear at all seasons, but the rock-dove only in the autumn. The ring-dove is said to be more long-lived than these others; in fact it lives thirty or forty years. Until death comes, the males do not desert the females, nor the females the males, but when one dies, whichever is left lives in solitary bereavement. The same is true also of crows, ravens, and jackdaws. In the entire pigeon class, male and female sit on the eggs in turn, and when the young are hatched the male spits on them that they may not be bewitched.^f It lays two eggs, the first of which makes a male, the second a female. They lay at all seasons of the year; hence they lay as much as ten times in the year, in Egypt even twelve times. Having laid once, the hen conceives again the next day." ^a From the wild pigeon (peleias).

^b See crit. note. The true statement is that the pigeon

Aristotle says that the pigeon (peristera) is different ^a; that the wild pigeon is smaller, and that it becomes tame; the pigeon, moreover, is dark and small, with red, rough feet; hence nobody keeps it as a domestic fowl.^b A peculiarity of the pigeon, he says,^c is that they bill each other when they are about to couple; otherwise the females will not tolerate the male. But the older bird, he says, can mount the female first even without billing. Younger birds always cover only after they have done this. Even the females cover each other when no male is near, after billing. And though they eject nothing into each other, they lay eggs, but no chick comes from them. The Dorians use the word peleias for peristera, as, for example, Sophron in his Mimes of Women. But Callimachus, in his book On Birds, explains ^d phassa (ring-dove), pyrallis, pigeon, and turtle-dove, as different birds. Alexander of Myndus says that the ring-dove, does not raise its head when drinking, as does the turtle-dove, and that it makes no sound in the winter season except after a period of fair weather. It is said that if the rock-dove eats the seed of the mistletoe and then lets a dropping fall upon a tree, a new growth of mistletoe is produced. Daïmachus, in his History of India, records ^e that yellow pigeons occur in India. Charon of Lampsacus, in giving an account of Mardonius and the Persian host that was destroyed off Mount Athos, writes, in his History of (peristera) is more easily tamed than the wild pigeon (peleias), and the wild pigeon is dark and small, and cannot be domesticated.

Persia^a : “ On that occasion white pigeons appeared for the first time in Greece, having never occurred there before.” Aristotle says^b that when their young are hatched, pigeons open their mouths and spit into them salty earth which they have chewed, and by this means prepare them for taking their food. On Mount Eryx, in Sicily, there is a stated time, called the Festival of Embarkation, when, they say, the goddess^c embarks for Libya. On that occasion the pigeons which flock about the place disappear as if they had joined the goddess in her journey. And after nine days, at the so-called Festival of Debarkation, one pigeon flies forth out of the sea and alights upon the temple, and then all the rest appear. Thereupon all the inhabitants round about who enjoy ample means begin to feast, while the rest applaud joyfully, and the whole place smells of butter,^d which they employ as a sign of the goddess’s return. Autocrates in his Achaean History records^e that Zeus even changed himself into a pigeon when he fell in love with a maiden of Aegium named Phthia. in Dorcis or The Woman who Smacks he has the feminine form peristera, and says that the pigeons of Sicily are particularly fine ^a: "I keep pigeons in my house, the Sicilian kinds, which are very choice." Pherecrates in Old Women has the masculine ^b: "Send the pigeon to tell the news." And in The Broad he has a neuter diminutive ^c: "Nay, little pigeon (peristerion), soft as Cleisthenes, fly, and take me to Cythera and to Cyprus." Nicander, mentioning the pigeons of Sicily in the second book of his Georgics, says ^d: "And so thou must at least keep Dracontiad or Sicilian pigeons in thy halls; they lay two eggs at a time, and not ravening birds, and not snakes, it is said, can harm their shelly coats.^e"

Ducks.—Alexander of Myndus says ^f that in the case of these birds the male is larger and more varied in colour. The kind called glaucion,^g because of the colour of its eyes, is a little smaller than the common duck. Of those called "feeders,"^h the male has conspicuous markings; but it is less . . .ⁱ than the duck. The males have beaks which are flat and proportionately smaller than the duck's. The little grebe, smallest of all aquatic birds, is a dirty black in colour, and it has a beak which is sharp and protects the eyes ; it dives below frequently. There is also another kind of feeder larger than the common duck, but smaller than a Nile goose. The birds called phaskades are a little larger than the grebes ; they resemble ducks in other respects. The so-called uria^a is not much smaller than a duck ; in colour it is of a dirty clay, and it has a long and narrow bill. The coot, likewise, has a narrow bill ; it is rounder in appearance ; its breast is ashy-coloured, its back somewhat darker. The duck (netta) and the grebe (kolymbas), from which are derived the verbs nechesthai (swim) and kolymbân (dive), are mentioned along with many other marsh birds by Aristophanes in The Acharnians, in these lines^b : “ Ducks, jackdaws, francolins, coots, sandpipers, grebes.” Callimachus, too, mentions them in his work On Birds.^c

Certain meats were brought in which had been stewed together in a broth, and someone said, “ Give me some ‘choked’^e bits of meat ” ; whereupon that word-architect, Ulpian, said : “ I shall choke myself to death unless you tell where you could have found such meat as that ! On one occasion, also, gazelles (dorkades) were served, and Palamedes, the Eleatic lexicographer, said : " Not unpleasing is the flesh of roes (dorkônes). " In answer to him Myrtilus said : " Only the form dorkades is used, not dorkônes. Thus Xenophon in the first book of the Anabasis ^c : ' There were in the desert also bustards and gazelles.' The Peacock.—Antiphanes, in The Soldier or Tychon, shows that this bird was rare when he says ^d : " When anyone imported just a pair of peacocks, it was a rare thing ; but to-day they are more numerous than quails." So Eubulus in Phoenix.^e For in fact the peacock is an object of wonder because of its rarity. " The peacock," says Aristotle,^f " has parted toes, is graminivorous, and lays eggs when it is three years old ; in this period it also acquires the varied colours of its plumage. It sits on its eggs for about thirty days. Once a year it lays twelve eggs ; these are laid not all at once, but at intervals of two days. Yet the birds which lay for the first time lay only eight eggs. It also lays wind eggs, like the hen, but not more than two to the clutch. It hatches and broods like the hen." “ Lest haply I keep such a peacock in the House of Persephone,^a waking up the sleepers there.” There is a speech written by the orator Antiphon containing an epigram on peacocks, and in the course of the speech there occurs no mention whatever of their name; in it he calls them “ spangled birds,” and says that they were kept by Demus, the son of Pyrilampes, and that many persons, in eager desire for a sight of the birds, came from Lacedaemon and Thessaly, and bent every effort to get some of the eggs. Describing their appearance he writes ^b : “ Should anyone desire to establish these birds in town, they would fly up and be off. Yet if one clips their wings, they will be robbed of their beauty; for their plumage, not their body, is their beauty.” And that the sight of them was eagerly desired he shows again in the same speech : “ Any who wished could enter on the first day of the month, but if anyone came wishing to see them on the other days, in no case was he successful. And all this is not a matter of recent times,^c but has been going on for more than thirty years.” “ The word for peacock (tahôs),” says Tryphon,^d “ is pronounced by the Athenians with a circumflex accent and the rough breathing on the last syllable. And it is in this way that the reading occurs in Eupolis, Out of the Service (the testimony has been given above), and in The Birds of Aristophanes ^e : ‘ What ! You are really Tereus ? Are you a bird or a peacock (tahôs) ? ’ And again ^f : ‘ It’s a bird, of course. What in the world is it ? It can’t be a peacock (tahôs), can it ? ’ They also use the dative form tahoni, as Aristophanes in the same play.^a But it is difficult for Athenians and Ionians, in words of more than one syllable, to put the rough breathing on the last syllable beginning with a vowel. In any case consistency requires that the last syllable have the smooth breathing, like neôs (temple),^b leôs (people), Tyndareôs, Meneleôs, leiponeôs (deserting the ship), euneôs (supplied with ships), Neileôs, praos (mild) hyios (son), Ceios (Cean), Chios (Chian), dios (divine), chreios (useful), pleios (full), leios (smooth), laios (left), baios (little), phaios (grey), pêos (kinsman), goos (mourning), thoos (quick), rhoos (stream), zoos (alive). For by its very nature, the rough breathing is fond of the first position^c and likes to take the lead, and so it cannot in any way be imprisoned in the last parts of a word. The bird is called tahôs from the extending (tasis) of its feathers." Seleucus, in the fifth book of his work On Hellenistic Greek, says: "Tahôs; contrary to the rule, Attic writers aspirate and circumflex. In the simple pronunciation of words, the rough breathing is wont to be pronounced in connexion with the initial vowel, and in that position it speeds forward and hurries faster and so extends over the whole word. Hence the Athenians, recognizing also the true nature of this accent by its position, do not put it directly over the vowels as they do the other marks of accent, but place it in front of them. I believe also that the ancients expressed the rough breathing by the letter H. Hence, too, the Romans write H before all aspirated words, thus marking clearly its quality of leadership. If, then, that is the nature of the rough breathing, perhaps its addition on the last syllable of the word taos by Attic writers is irrational."

Many other remarks were made in the course of the symposium concerning each of the dishes brought in ; and Larensis then said : " Well, even I myself, like the altogether noble Ulpian, have something to propound to you ; for we feed on questions. What do you think the tetrax is ? " Someone replied, " A kind of bird." Now it is the fashion among grammarians to say to their pupils, concerning all kinds of problems, " That's a kind of plant," or " A kind of bird," or " A kind of stone." Larensis said : " Even I know, good sir, that the witty Aristophanes mentions it in these words, in The Birds ^a : ' To the purple coot and the pelican, to the pelicinus ^b and the phlexis, ^b to the tetrax ^c and the peacock.' I am anxious to learn from you whether any mention of it occurs in any other author. For Alexander of Myndus, in the second book of his work On Winged Animals, makes no mention of the large bird called tetrax, but of one which is very small. He says, namely : ' The tetrax is equal in size to the francolin ^d ; in colour it is like clay, varied with dusky spots and large lines ; it is a fruit-eater. When it lays an egg, it utters a cackling sound.' ^e And Epicharmus in The Marriage of Hebe ^f : ' For they take quails and sparrows, and crested larks that love to roll in the dust, seed-picking pheasants too, and shining fig-peckers.' And in other verses he says ^a: 'There were also many herons with long curving necks, and seed-picking pheasants.' Now, since you have nothing to add (for you are silent), I will exhibit the bird to you. For being procurator of the Lord Emperor ^b in Moesia and having charge of the administration of that province, I have seen the bird in that country. Learning that that was the name given to the bird among the Moesians and the Paeonians, I recalled it in the verses of Aristophanes. I thought, too, that the creature must have been deemed worthy of mention by the learned Aristotle in that costly treatise of his; for the story goes that the Stagirite received eight hundred talents from Alexander to further his research on animals; but I could not find anything said about it, and I was glad to have the witty Aristophanes as a most trustworthy witness." As he said these words, someone came in bringing the pheasant in its cage. In size it was larger than the largest cock, in appearance it resembled a purple coot; from its ears, on each side of the head, hung the wattles, like those of cocks; its voice was of low pitch. When we had admired the brilliant colours of the bird, it was dressed and served not long afterward, and its flesh resembled that of the ostrich, on which, also, we have often feasted.

Simaristus, in the third book of his Synonyms, writes as follows: "The fleshy parts rising up transversely in the loins are called psyae. The hollows on each side they call 'cups' or 'sockets.'" Clearchus, in the second book of his work On Anatomy,^a says: "The muscular pieces of flesh on each side, which some call psyae, others alopeces (foxes), and others nephrometrae (kidney-matrices)." The most sacred Hippocrates,^b also, mentions the loin-muscles. They got the name of psyae because they can be easily wiped off (apopsasthai), or as being flesh of a sort that lightly touches (epi-psauousa) the bones on the surface of which it rests. The Hare.—Concerning this animal Archestratus, that Daedalus of cookery, has this to say^c: "As to the hare, there are many ways and many laws for dressing it. This, however, is the best, if thou bring the meat roasted to each guest in the midst of the drinking; let it be hot, simply sprinkled with salt, and take it off the spit when slightly underdone. Let it not trouble thee to see the divine blood^d oozing from the flesh, but eat it greedily. But all other modes of dressing are utterly superfluous in my eyes—sticky sauces with too much cheese and oil poured on, as though you were preparing an entrée of dogfish." The comic poet Nausicrates, in The Woman from Persia, says that one seldom finds a hare in Attica. His words are^e: "Really, who has ever yet seen lions in Attica, or any other beast like that? Why! It isn't easy to find even a hare there." But Alcaeus, in Callisto, makes it plain that there were a good many, in these lines^f: "A. What's Tryphon says ^a: "Aristophanes, in The Daughters of Danaus, pronounces the word for hare in the accusative with an acute accent and with an n on the last syllable ^b: 'He might perhaps let loose our hare (lagón ^c), and make clean off with it.' And in Men of Dinnerville ^d: 'I'm lost! I shall be seen plucking the hare.' ^e But Xenophon, in the Art of Hunting, has ^f the accusative without the n, and with a circumflex accent, lagô, which is curious, since the word with us is lagós. ^g And just as we say naós (temple) and laós (people) when they say neós and leós, so where we say lagós they will say lagós. Consistent with the accusative singular lagón is the nominative plural found in Sophocles' satyric play Amycus ^h: 'Cranes, tortoises, owls, kites, hares (lagoi).' On the other hand, the nominative plural lagôî (λαγῶι), pronounced with a long o like the accusative singular lagôn (λαγών), is found in The Flatterers of Eupolis ⁱ: 'Where there are rays and hares (λαγῶ) and ladies with rolling gait.' Some authorities, however, even here pronounce the last syllable, inconsistently, with a circumflex accent. ^j But the word should have an acute accent on the last syllable, since nouns ending in os have the same pitch throughout, even when they change over to the long o form in Attic Greek^a; thus naós, neōs (temple), kálos, kálōs (rope). So the form of the noun is used in Epicharmus, in Herodotus, and in the author of The Helots. Further, the Ionic form lagós (hare) occurs in^b ‘Stir in the sea-hare and drink.’ But the form lagōs is Attic, though even Attic writers say lagós, as Sophocles^c: ‘Cranes, ravens, owls, kites, hares.’ In the phrase ‘or cowering hare’ (lagōón),^d however, if it is Ionic, the long ō is superfluous; if Attic, the short o. The meat is called lagōia.”

^g And, therefore, should make an accus. lagón with short o and acute accent.

Hegesander of Delphi, in his Commentaries, says^e that “during the reign of Antigonus Gonatas such a quantity of hares occurred in Astypalaea that the Astypalaeans consulted the oracle about them. And the Pythian priestess told them to keep dogs and go a-hunting; so, within a year, more than six thousand were caught. This number resulted from a certain man of Anaphe letting loose two hares on the island; because on a former occasion a man of Astypalaea had let go two partridges on the island of Anaphe, and so great a number of partridges resulted in Anaphe that the inhabitants ran the risk of being driven from house and home. Now in the beginning Astypalaea had no hares, but it did have partridges; whereas Anaphe had no partridges, but had hares.” This animal, the hare, is very prolific, as Xenophon says in The Art of Hunting.^f And Herodotus says ^a: "First, because the hare is hunted by all creatures, beast and bird, as well as by man, therefore it is so very prolific, and it is the only one of all the animals which becomes pregnant again before the first foetus is born, and has in its womb one of its young covered with fur, while another is bare, another is just being shaped in the matrix, and still another is being conceived." Polybius, in the twelfth book of his Histories, says that an animal occurs similar to the hare which is called the cuniculus; he writes as follows ^b: "The cuniculus, as it is called, looks like a small hare when seen from a distance; but when one takes it in his hands, it has great differences in appearance and in its qualities as food. It occurs mostly underground." The philosopher Poseidonius, also, mentions them in his History ^c: "We too have seen many in the voyage from Dicaearcheia to Naples. For there is an island not far from land, along by the last districts of Dicaearcheia, which has few inhabitants but many of these cuniculi." There are some also which are called "brown hares." Diphilus (or Calliades) mentions them thus in A Mistake ^d: "A. What's this? Whence does he come? B. Brown is the hare, sweet is the jugged hare." Theopompus, in the twentieth book of the Histories, says ^e that in the neighbourhood of Bisaltia hares occur which have two livers.

quite as large as the beautiful Calydonian boar of story, someone said : “ I propose for your investigation, Ulpian, careful student and reasoner ^a that you are, the question, who has recorded the Calydonian boar as being a female as well as white in colour ? ” But he, after much thought, solemnly waived the question and said : “ Certainly, you pot-bellied gentlemen, if you haven’t had enough of such weighty matters already, you seem to me to surpass all those who have become notorious for gluttony ; suppose you inquire who they are. However, it is only right that you should pronounce the word sys (swine) with the initial s, being nearer its etymology. For the animal has its name because it bursts forth (seuesthai) and is of an aggressive disposition. But the custom has obtained of pronouncing the word also without the initial s, hys. Others think that sys is a form, as it were, for thys, that is, the animal which is suitable for sacrifice (thysia). Now then, if you please, answer me, who is it that (like ourselves) mentions the compound form syagrus for ‘ wild boar ’ ? Sophocles, indeed, applied the word to a dog in Lovers of Achilles, deriving it from sys agreuein, ‘ hunting boars.’ ^b He says ^c : ‘ You there, Syagrus, nurseling of Pelion ! ’ In Herodotus we find a proper name, Syagrus ; he was a Lacedaemonian by birth, and went on an embassy to Gelon of Syracuse to negotiate the alliance against the Medes. This is in the seventh book. ^d I also know

Like Philitas of Cos, therefore, who pondered what he called ‘the deceitful word,’ you run the risk some day of being quite dried up, as he was, by these worries. For he became very much emaciated in body through these studies, and died, as the epitaph on his monument shows: ‘Stranger, I am Philitas. The deceiving word caused my death, and studies of riddles late at eve.’ In order, then, that you also may not wither away by your study of the syagrus, learn that Antiphanes mentioned it in Kidnapped thus^b: ‘I will get and bring back to the house this very night a wild boar (syagrus), a lion, and a wolf.’ And Dionysius the Tyrant in Adonis^c: ‘Beneath this cave of the Nymphs, roofed o’er by nature’s hand, I take as my spoil the miscarried matrix^d of the wild boar, easy prey of dogs, and its hooves as first-fruits.’ Lynceus of Samos, in his Letter to Apollodorus, writes as follows: ‘That the goat meat shall be for the slaves, but the wild boar meat you shall keep for yourself and your friends.' Hippolochus of Macedonia, whom we mentioned in a preceding passage,^a in his Letter to the afore-mentioned Lynceus, also spoke of many wild boars. But since you have also dismissed the question you raised about the colour of the Calydonian boar, whether, that is, anyone records it as having been white in colour, we will tell who the author is; do you investigate this testimony. For it is a long time since I have happened to read the dithyrambs of Cleomenes of Rhegium; in the one which is entitled Meleager this fact is recorded.^b And I am not unaware that the inhabitants round about Sicily call the wild boar aschedorus. Aeschylus, at any rate, when he likens Perseus in The Phorcides to this wild boar, says ^c: 'He entered the cave like a wild boar (aschedorus).' And Sciras (he is a poet of what is called the Italian comedy, a native of Tarentum) says in Meleager ^d: 'Where neither shepherd dares to feed his flocks, nor wild boar wantons as he feeds.' That Aeschylus, who lived in Sicily, has made use of many Sicilian words, is nothing surprising."

There were also often served kids prepared in great variety; among others were those which had a great deal of silphium, and they afforded us no ordinary pleasure. What is more, the flesh of the goat is very nourishing. Cleitomachus of Carthage, at any rate, who is second to none in the New Academy as regards philosophic attainments, tells of a Theban athlete who surpassed his contemporaries in strength because he used goat's flesh as a diet. The dinners spoken of in the comic poets afford very pleasant hearing to the ear, rather than delight to the gullet. For example, the lines of Antiphanes in The Sempstress: he says ^b: “A. What animal’s flesh would you like to eat most? B. What, you ask? Something that doesn’t cost much. If it’s sheep, let it be what has neither wool nor cheese; I mean lamb, dear sir. If goat’s meat, by the same rule, what produces no cheese; I mean a kid. For the profits derived from full-grown animals are such that I can put up with eating these cheap ones.” And in Cyclops Antiphanes says ^c: “These land animals shall come to you as a present from me—an ox from the herd, a forest-roving he-goat, a she-goat from heaven, a castrated ram, a castrated boar, a pig not castrated, a shoat, a hare, kids, . . . green cheese, dry cheese, crushed cheese, grated cheese, sliced cheese, cream cheese.”

Upon these words, we were handed the "rose-dish," as it is called, the praises of which our wise cook declaimed before he showed us what he was bringing. And he laughed in mockery at the celebrated cooks of the past, mentioning whom he said : " What did the cook in the comic poet Anaxippus ever invent to equal this ? That cook boasted thus in Behind the Veil^a : ' A. Sophon of Acarnania and Damoxenus of Rhodes were fellow-pupils in this art ; their teacher was Labdacus of Sicily. These men, to be sure, wiped out the old trite seasonings from the cookery-books, and utterly abolished from our midst the mortar ; I mean, for example, caraway-seed, vinegar, silphium, cheese, coriander, seasonings which Cronus^b used ; all of these they have removed, thinking that he who used such devices was a mere huckster. But they themselves, governor, desired only oil and a new stewpan, and a fire that was quick and not blown too often ; with that they prepare every dinner. They were the first to take away tears and loud sneezing and sniffing from the table, and they cleaned completely the

A lad has a girl he is courting, he is eating up his father's estate. Before him I place cuttle-fishes, squids, and various rock-fishes served with dainty sauces ; for a person like that is not particular what he eats, but has his thoughts continually on love-making. Before the philosopher I place a ham, or pigs' feet ; the creature is excessively greedy. Before a tax-collector, a grey-fish, an eel, a gilt-head. After seeing a man's face I shall know what every one among you desires to eat.' Again, gentlemen of Dinnerville, what says the cook in The Law-giver^b of Dionysius? For it is worth while to mention him also: 'A. You have done me a great favour, Simias, the gods are my witness, in giving me this warning; for the cook must know a very long time before he undertakes to prepare his dinner the persons for whom he is to prepare the dinner. If he simply looks at this one question alone, how he is to prepare a dish according to style, and does not foresee and take thought of this, namely, in what manner he is to serve it, or at what moment or in what way he is to dress it, then he is no longer a cook, but only a hash-slinger. No, it is not the same thing, the difference is great. For not every one is called a general who gets office, but only he who is able to move at ease amid trouble, and see clearly what is to be done, is a general, while the other is merely a leader; just so it is in our power to dress dishes, to carve, to cook sauces, to blow the fire; anybody can do that; a hash-slinger is only the man of that sort, but the cook is something else. the proper place, season, host, and again the guest, when and what fish he should buy, is not for any ordinary person; you can always get the same dish, nearly, everywhere; but you can't always feel the same charm in these dishes nor have the flavour equal. For the art has taken on no limits and no authority, and she is her own master. But though you may pursue the art well, yet lose the crucial moment in it, the art is lost besides. ΣΙΜΙΑΣ. Man, you're great! Α. Yes, but as for that fellow who, you said just now, has come with knowledge of many sumptuous banquets, I'll make him forget them all, Simias, if I can only show him an omelette, and set before him a dinner redolent of the Attic breeze. In answer to this Aemilianus said: "As Hegesippus says in Brothers^a: 'My good sir, much has been said by many men on the subject of cookery.' 'A. Do you either prove that you can do something novel (as compared with your predecessors), or else stop butchering me; and show us what you are bringing in and tell us what it is.'" The cook replied: "'B. You despise me perhaps because I am a cook; for what I have accomplished in this art of mine,'—to quote Demetrius; he says, in the play entitled The Areopagite^b: 'B. But what I have accomplished in this art of mine, no play-actor has ever accomplished at all. This art of mine is an empire of smoke. I was a sour-sauce-maker at the court of Seleucus, and in the household of Agathocles of Sicily I was the first to introduce the royal lentil-soup. But I haven't mentioned the thing most important; a certain Lachares^c was trying to entertain his friends in time of famine, and I saved the day by introducing some capers.'" "'A. Yes, Lachares stripped Athena bare, though she never bothered him at all; but I will strip you bare this minute, because you bother me,' unless you show what you are bringing in," said Aemilianus. So at last the cook said: "I give the name of 'rose-dish' to this casserole; it is prepared in such a fashion that when you get it you may have not merely a sauce

I crushed the most fragrant roses in a mortar, then laid on carefully boiled brains of fowls and pigs, from which the stringy fibres had been removed, also the yolks of eggs ; then olive-oil, garum-sauce, pepper, and wine. All this I stirred thoroughly and placed in a new casserole, giving it a fire that was gentle and steady." With these words he opened the casserole and produced for the company such a delicious odour that one of the company truly said : " If it were but shaken, in the bronze-floored mansion of Zeus, its fragrance went forth even to earth and to heaven." ^b So great was the fragrance diffused from the roses.

After this there were brought in " roast fowls, lentil-soup and peas, pots and all " ^c ; also such foods as Phaenias of Eresus writes of in his work On Plants. He says : " Every cultivated leguminous plant that is grown from seed is sown in order to be boiled, as the bean and the pea ; for a boiled dish like porridge is the result ; then there are, again, the yolk-coloured vetches, like the chickling ; and the sort boiled to make lentil-soup, as the tare and lentil ; again there is that which is used as fodder for four-footed animals, like bitter-vetch for plough-cattle, and tares for sheep." said: "Here are stones for you; let anyone who wants to, throw them; lentil-soup is a good thing winter or summer."^a The man was famous chiefly for his parodies, and made himself the talk of the town by his mischievous and theatrical recitation of epic lines; for this he became famous in Athens. With his Battle of the Giants he beguiled the Athenians to such an extraordinary degree that they laughed most heartily on that evil day when reports came to them in the theatre of the disasters in Sicily. No one left the theatre, therefore, although practically all of them had lost relatives. They therefore wept in secret, and did not leave, in order that the spectators from other cities might not see that they were disturbed by the calamity; and they remained to listen to the end, although Hegemon himself, when he heard the news, had decided to stop the recitation. At the time when the Athenians, at the height of their sea power, were transferring the hearing of lawsuits affecting the islands to the city, someone indicted Hegemon also, and took his suit to Athens. He, on his arrival there, gathered together the artists of Dionysus^b and went in their company to demand the aid of Alcibiades. He urged them to have no fear, and telling them all to follow him he went to the temple of the Mother of the Gods, where the indictments of suits were kept; there he wet his finger with his tongue and rubbed out the case against Hegemon. The clerk and the magistrate, though they were indignant, held their peace on account of Alcibiades'

^a Kock ii. 461. The statement that Timocles wrote tragedies as well as comedies runs counter to Plato's well-influence, especially as the plaintiff in the case had discreetly defaulted.' Here you have, Ulpian, our account of the pelting-festival. When you like, you shall tell us of the one at Eleusis." And Ulpian said: "Good Democritus, you have mentioned a pot, and thereby reminded me that I have often wanted to learn what the so-called pot of Telemachus is, and who is this Telemachus." Democritus said: "Timocles, the poet of comedy (he was also a writer of tragedy) in the play Forgetfulness, says^a: 'After him, Telemachus met another man whom he greeted very heartily and then said: "Lend me the pots in which you boil your beans." Yes, that's what he said; and again, seeing Pheidippus, the fat son of Chaerephilus, passing in the distance, he whistled to him, and told the other to send large hampers.^b' That Telemachus was of the deme Acharnae is shown by the same poet thus, in Dionysus ^c: 'A. The Acharnian Telemachus keeps up his public speaking still. He's also like our newly-purchased Syrian slaves. B. How's that? What does he do? I am anxious to learn. A. He carries in his arms a pot of beans for the harvest-festival.^d' And in Icarian Satyrs Timocles says^e: 'Hence we had known dictum that no tragic poet wrote comedies (Rep. 395 A; theoretically they might, Symp. 223 D, Ion 534 C). Timocles' comedy, 'Ἰκάριοι Σάτυροι, Satyrs of Icaria, was mistaken for a satyric drama, and this led to the wrong inference that he wrote tragedies. See R. J. T. Wagner, Symbolarum ad comic. graec. historiam criticam capita iv, p. 64.

^b The meaning is uncertain, but the hampers of beans, large enough to contain a man (2 Corinth. xi. 33), were doubtless required to satisfy the huge appetite of Pheidippus (Athen. 120 b, cf. 339 e).

nothing in the house. Then I spent a miserable night trying to sleep first on a hard bed, and Thudippus completely suffocated us with his smells, and hunger gripped us as well. Then I rushed to the ardent ^a Dion, but even he had nothing. I went then to the good Telemachus of Acharnae, and, finding a heap of beans, I grabbed some and ate them up. But when the donkey saw us, like Cephisodorus on the platform, he let forth wind.' In the light of this, it is plain that Telemachus constantly fed on pots of beans, and celebrated Bean-Festival ^b as a windy holiday. A porridge of beans is mentioned by the comic poet Heniochus in Trochilus; he says ^c: 'A. I was reflecting, so help me, how much better figs are than cress.^d But you say that you have talked with Pauson about the—the—thingumbob? B. A. Funny, how one can always recognize what Pauson is up to ! How he is always interested in beans, this ridiculous quibbler ! ' ' "

This kind of talk often went on while water was being brought for the hands. And again Ulpian asked whether the form chernibon is found for wash-basin, as we are accustomed to use it. Someone made answer by reciting the passage in the Iliad ^a : " Thus spake the old man, and bade the stewardess who attended him to pour clean water over the hands ; and she stood by in attendance, holding a basin (chernibon) and a pitcher in her hands." But Attic writers say chernibion, as Lysias, when in the Speech against Alcibiades ^b he says : " (to use) the golden basins (chernibia) and censers." Eupolis has the word cheironiptron (handwasher) in The Demes ^c : " If one happens to run ^d first, he gets a hand-basin (cheironiptron) to keep ; but when a man is a good and useful citizen, even though he outdoes all in goodness, there is not a hand-basin for him." Epicharmus, in The Pilgrims, uses the word cheironibon in these lines ^e : " A harp, tripods, chariots, bronze tables, hand-basins (cheironiba), libation - cups, cauldrons of bronze." But the more common use is to employ regularly the phrase " water over the hand," as Eupolis does in The Golden Age, Ameipsias in The

Sling, and Alcaeus in Sacred Marriage.^a This is the most common. But Philyllius, in Augê, has "over the hands," thus ^b: "At last the ladies have finished their dinner; it's now high time to take away the tables, then sweep up the floor,^c and after that give 'water over the hands' to all, and some perfume." Menander in The Water Jar ^d: "They have had their 'water over the hands,' my dear, and are waiting for (the libation)." Aristophanes the grammarian, in his commentaries on the Portraits of Callimachus,^e ridicules those who do not know the difference between the terms "over the hand" and "hand-wash." For, he says, among the ancients the term "over the hand" is used for the water poured before luncheon or dinner, whereas that poured after these meals is a "hand-wash."^f But it would appear that the grammarian has observed this only in Attic writers, since Homer, at least, says in one place ^g: "Water for washing; and she drew up a polished table." But in another place ^h: "And while heralds poured water on their hands, maidservants heaped bread beside them in baskets." Again, Sophron in Mimes of Women ⁱ: "Wretched Booby-girl, bring water for the hand and give the dinner we have waited for." But in the tragedians and the comedians the word for basin is read in the accusative with an acute accent on the penult; thus in Euripides, Heracles^a: "That Alcmena's son might dip it^b into the lustral water (cherníba)"; also in Eupolis, The Goats^c: "Here you shall stop the lustral water." This is water into which they dipped a brand taken from the altar on which they performed the sacrifice; with this they sprinkled the bystanders and purified them. But the right pronunciation requires the acute on the syllable before the penult.^d For such verbal compounds, ending in ps and derived from the perfect tense, retain the penultimate syllable of the perfect; and if this penultimate syllable is spoken with two m's, the last syllable has no accent; thus perfect léleimmai (am deserted), aigílips (goat-deserted, steep), tétrimmai (worn), oikótrips (house-worn, slave), kéklemmai (stolen), boíkleps (cattle thief), epithet of Hermes in Sophocles,^e béblemmái (seen) and katóbleps (downlooker)^f found in Peculiar Creatures, by Archelaus of Chersonesus. And in the oblique cases such words keep the tone on the same syllable.^g Aristophanes, in Heroes, has the form chernibion.^h

They also used for the hands, when washing them thoroughly, a soapy substance to remove the dirt, as Antiphanes shows in *The Bag*ⁱ: "A. While I am listening to you, bid someone bring what I need

Further, they used to smear their hands with perfumes, spurning the crumbs of bread^a which Spartans called "dog-bits," as Polemon avers in his Epistle concerning Obscure Words.^b On the practice of smearing the hands with perfumes Epigenes (or Antiphanes) says in The Abolition of Money^c: "When that time comes, you shall have your daily exercise^d and wash your hands in correct style, with fragrant earth."^e Again, Philoxenus, in the poem entitled The Banquet,^f says: "And thereupon slaves poured lustral water over the hands, with soap-powders mixed with orris-scent, pouring in as much water, gently warmed, as one desired; towels, too, they offered, clean and woven of fine linen, and ambrosia-smelling unguents and chaplets a-bloom with violets." ^b Which meant both the basin and the water in it.

They used to call the dirty water (aponimma) from the hands and feet aponiptron. Aristophanes ^a: "Like people pouring out slops (aponiptron) at evening-time." Probably they also called the basin by this name, as in the case of the word cheironiptron.^b But there is a special use of the word aponimma in Athens, where it is applied to the ritual in honour of the dead, or to the purification of the unclean, as Anticleides says in the work entitled The Expositor. For after some preliminary remarks on offerings to the dead, he writes ^c: "Dig a trench on the west side of the grave.^d Then standing beside the trench face the west, and pour over it water, reciting these words: 'Water for cleansing to you for whom it is meet and lawful.' After that pour scented oil." This is also cited by Dorotheus, who alleges that the following is also found written in the ancestral ritual of the Eupatridae, concerning the purification of suppliants: "Thereupon, after you and all the other participants in the sacrifice have received water, wash the hands and purge yourself and wash away the blood-guilt of him who is to be purified; after that shake the water of purification and pour it into the same place."^e

The word cheiromaktron (hand-wiper) is used of the coarse towel with which they wiped the hands dry; this is what Philoxenus of Cythera, in the passage cited above,^f called ektrimma. Aristophanes, in Masters of the Frying-pan ^g: "Here, slave, water over the hand, and quickly! Bring along the towel."

And it should be noted that Attic writers used the phrase "over the hand" even of the ablution after dinner, and they did not, as the grammarian Aristophanes says,^a use it of the ablution before eating, reserving the term "hand-wash" for that which occurred after dinner. Sophocles in Oenomaus ^b: "With head shorn in Scythian fashion to make a towel." ^c Herodotus, also, has the word "towel" in the second book.^d Xenophon, in the first book of the Education (of Cyrus), writes ^e: "But when you touch any foods of this kind, you immediately clean your hand on the towels, evidently because you dislike very much to have it soiled by them." Polemon, again, in the sixth book of his Address to Antigonus and Adaeus, speaks ^f of the difference in the phrases "over the hand" and "hand-wash." Demonstus in Achelous speaks of the pre-prandial "over the hand" in these lines ^g: "Everyone was in eager haste, knowing that he was entertaining a man with sharp appetite who was also a Boeotian.^h He, at any rate, omitted the ceremony of 'over the hand,' saying that that was his to take after dinner." A linen towel (omolion) is mentioned by Cratinus in Archilochi ⁱ: "Her hair swathed heavily in coarse towels, full of all unworthiness." And Sappho, when in the fifth book of her Lyric Poems she addresses

Aphrodite,^a "These towels of radiant purple Mnasis hath sent to thee from Phocaea, gifts worthy to veil thy cheeks," means that the towels are an ornamental head-covering, as Hecataeus, or whoever wrote the account of travels entitled Asia, makes clear ^b : "The women have towels ^c on their heads." And Herodotus says in the second book ^d : "After these events they said this king descended alive into the place which the Greeks recognize as Hades, and there he played at dice with Demeter ; sometimes he beat her, sometimes again he was beaten by her ; and he came back up again with a golden towel ^e as a present from her." Then there is the boy who offered water for the hands to Heracles and splashed him from the basin ; Heracles killed him with a blow from his knuckles ; Hellanicus in his Histories says ^f that his name was Archias ; on his account Heracles withdrew from Calydon. But in the second book of his Tale of Phoroneus Hellanicus calls ^g him Cherias. Herodorus, in the seventeenth book of his Story of Heracles, calls ^h him Eunomus. Heracles also killed accidentally Cyathus the son of Pyles and brother of Antimachus, when he was acting as wine-pourer for him, as Nicander records in the second book of his Scenes from Mt. Oeta ⁱ ; in his honour, Nicander says, a sacred enclosure was consecrated by Heracles

BOOK X

“ LIKE the varied bounty of a rich dinner, such must be the fare provided by the clever poet for the spectators, so that each departs after getting his fill, having eaten and drunk again what he likes, and the entertainment is not one monotonous dish ”; so, friend Timocrates, says the tragic poet Astydamas in the satyric play Heracles.^a Come, then, let us here take up what naturally follows the preceding discussion, and explain that Heracles also was a glutton.^b Almost all the poets and historians make this plain. Epicharmus, for example, says in Busiris ^c: “ First, if you should see him eating you would die. His gullet thunders inside, his jaw rattles, his molar crackles, his canine tooth gnashes, he sizzles at the nostrils, he waggles his ears.” And Ion, after dilating on his gluttony in Omphale, adds ^d: “ In his ravenous hunger he gulped down the joints and the coals as well." Ion has taken this idea from Pindar, who said ^a: "Two steaming carcasses of oxen he heaped upon the coals, crackling in the fire; then did I perceive the shrieking of flesh and the heavy moan of bones; short was the time allowed for one to see and discern it fittingly." And so, having conceived him as being that kind of person in his gluttonies, they have assigned to him as his attribute among the birds the gull, which is called the scavenger.^b Heracles is also represented as competing with Lepreus in an eating-contest; Lepreus challenged him, and Heracles won. Zenodotus, in the second book of his Epitomes, says that Lepreus was the son of Caucon, the son of Poseidon and of Astydameia, the daughter of Phorbas, and he had recommended that Heracles be bound in chains when he demanded his pay of Augeas.^c After Heracles had completed his labours he proceeded against Caucon's people, and at Astydameia's entreaty was reconciled with Lepreus. After this Lepreus contended with Heracles in throwing the discus, in bailing water, and in determining who should consume a bull quicker, and he was beaten in all. He then put on a breastplate and challenged Heracles, and was killed in the fight. Matris, in his Eulogy of Heracles, says that Heracles was also challenged to a drinking-contest by Lepreus, and again he was beaten. The same stories are told by the Chian orator Caucalus, brother of the historian Theopompus, in his Eulogy of Heracles.

Odysseus, also, is represented by Homer as a hearty eater and a glutton when he says ^a: "But as for me, let me sup, distressed as I am; for there is nought more shameless than a wretched belly, which bids a man of necessity to be mindful of it, though he be sore tried, and commands him to take his fill." Indeed, his gluttony is shown to be excessive in these lines, besides which he utters sententious remarks about the belly at an inappropriate time. For though he were famished, he ought to have been patient to the end or else have been more moderate in regard to food. But the last part of the passage exhibits in all its completeness his gluttony and voracity ^b: "Even as I bear sorrow in my heart; but the belly ever bids me eat and drink, and brings forgetfulness of all that I have suffered, and commands me to take my fill." Even Sardanapalus ^c of old would not have ventured to say that. And so, old man though he was, "he ate ravenously abundance of meat and sweet wine." ^d

Theagenes, the athlete from Thasos, devoured a bull all alone, as Poseidippus says in his Epigrams: "And on a wager I once ate a Maeonian ox; for my own country Thasos could not have furnished a meal to Theagenes; whatever I ate, I kept asking for more. For this reason I stand in bronze, holding forth my hand." Milon of Croton, as Theodorus of Hierapolis says ^a in his work On Athletic Contests, used to eat twenty pounds of meat and as many of bread, and he drank three pitchers of wine.^b And at Olympia he put a four-year-old bull on his shoulders and carried it round the stadium; after which he cut it up and ate it all alone in a single day. Titormus of Aetolia ate an ox in competition with him at breakfast, as Alexander of Aetolia records.^c And Phylarchus, in the third book of his Histories, says ^d that Milon devoured a bull reclining in front of the altar of Zeus; wherefore the poet Dorieus wrote these lines in his honour: "Such was Milon, when he lifted the weight from the ground, a four-year-old steer, at the feast of Zeus, and on his shoulders he bore the monstrous beast, as lightly as though it were a new-born lamb, through the entire assemblage. And that was wonder enough; but a greater marvel than this, stranger, he wrought before the Pisan altar; for the ox, unbroken to the yoke, that he had carried in the procession, even that ox he cut up and ate all alone." Astyanax of Miletus, thrice victor at Olympia in successive contests in the pancratium, was once invited to dinner by the Persian Ariobarzanes, and on his arrival he promised to eat all the food prepared for all the guests, and actually did so. And when the Persian demanded, as Theodorus records,^e that Astyanax should perform a feat worthy of his great physical powers, he broke off a bronze lentil-shaped ornament from the couch, and having softened it (with his hands) he pulled it out flat. When he died and his body was burned, one urn was not sufficient to hold his bones, in fact two were barely enough. And the dishes which had been prepared for the nine male guests at the dinner in the house of Ariobarzanes he ate up alone.

In fact, it is no wonder that these men became gluttons; for all who go in for athletic contests are taught to eat heartily in connexion with their gymnastic exercises. Hence, also, Euripides says in the first edition of his Autolycus ^a: "Of all the countless evils infesting Greece, there is none worse than the tribe of athletes: first, they neither learn how to live aright, nor could they if they would; how, indeed, when a man is slave to his jaw, and a victim of his belly, could he acquire wealth to increase his father's store? ^b Again, they cannot endure poverty, nor adapt themselves to misfortunes. Accustomed as they are to ignoble habits, they find it hard to change them when difficulties come. In the hey-day of their prime they come and go, the glorious, the darlings of the city; but when bitter old age falls upon them, they disappear, worn-out garments that have lost their nap." ^c I cannot approve the custom of the Greeks, who for these men's sakes call an assembly and pay them the honour of useless pleasures to grace a feast. What succour to his native town does a man bring who has won a crown for clever wrestling? or a man who is fleet of foot, or who can hurl the discus, or deal a neat blow on the jaw? Will they fight the enemy with discus in hand, or through the line of shields ^a smite with the fist and cast the enemy forth from their native land? No man, when standing close to cold steel, commits such foolishness. It is meet, I ween, that we should crown wise and good men with leaves; him, also, who guides the State most rightly, a man sober and just; him, too, who can avert evil deeds by eloquence, dispelling fights and factions. For such are the things which are good for the whole State, and for all Greeks."

Euripides has borrowed these ideas from the elegies of Xenophanes of Colophon, who said ^b: "Nay, if a man should win victory by the swiftness of his feet, or in the pentathlon, where stands the precinct of Zeus by the streams of the Pisê at Olympia; or in wrestling, or because he hath skill in painful boxing, or in that dread contest which they call the pancratium, he would be more illustrious to look upon, in the eyes of his fellow-citizens, and he would win a conspicuous front seat at the contests, and would have bread from the public store, given by the city, and a present to be an heirloom for ever; yea, even if he won with horses, all these things would fall to his lot, though he be not so worthy as I. For my art is better than the strength of men and of horses. But there is no sense in all these opinions, and it is not right to prefer strength to good wisdom. Not though a man rise up among the people as a good boxer, or good at the pentathlon, or in wrestling, or even in swiftness of foot, which has preference among all men's deeds of strength in the contest—not for that reason can a city enjoy better laws. Small must be any joy that comes to a city for this, if a man wins in a contest beside the banks of the Pisê; for that cannot fatten the store-houses of a city.” Many other contentions Xenophanes makes regarding his own art, attacking as useless and unprofitable the whole idea of athleticism. And Achæus of Eretria also dilates upon the luxuriant condition of athletes, saying ^a: “ Their loins bare, their sleek arms swelling with youthful power, they ply their trade,^b strong shoulders glistening in youthful bloom; lavishing oil, they anoint their breasts and the hollow of their shields,^c as if they had been used to luxury in boyhood.”

Heracleitus, in The Host, tells of a woman named Helen who ate huge quantities. So Poseidippus speaks in his Epigrams of Phyromachus, to whom he addressed the following epigram: “ Phyromachus, as greedy at eating all things as a raven through the livelong night, is now contained within this rugged trench, in the torn wrapping of a Pellenian cloak. Nay then, Atticus, anoint his headstone, and crown it with a wreath, if ever that parasite revelled with you. And he came, toothless, with black looks from out of livid eyebrows, clad in a hide with the hairside out, attended by no slave^a; verily, after those bouts of yore he has come at last under the dominion of the Muse of the tomb.”^b Amarantus of Alexandria, in his work On the Theatre, says that Herodorus, the trumpeter of Megara, was only three and a half cubits tall,^c but strong in his ribs; he would eat six pints of wheat bread and twenty pounds of whatever meat he could find; he would drink two pitchers of wine,^d and could sound two trumpets at one and the same time. He had the habit of sleeping on nothing but a lion skin. When he blew his trumpet the signal was extraordinarily loud. For example, when Demetrius the son of Antigonus was besieging Argos, and the troops were unable to bring the siege-engine close up to the walls on account of its weight, Herodorus signalled with his two trumpets, and the soldiers were so fired with eagerness by the loudness of the sound that they perforce brought the engine up. He won in the circuit of the games ten times, and always sat when he dined,^e as Nestor records in his Theatrical Commentaries. There was also a woman, Aglaïs the daughter of Megacles, who blew the trumpet for the procession in the first great parade at Alexandria; she wore a wig and a plume on her head, as Poseidippus discloses in his Epigrams. She herself also would eat twelve pounds of meat, four pints of wheat bread, and would drink a pitcher of wine.

Lityersas was a bastard son of Midas and king of the Celaenians, in Phrygia; he was a man fierce of aspect and cruel, and terribly gluttonous. The tragic poet Sositheus tells about him in his play Daphnis or Lityersas as follows^a: "He eats three loaves of bread, three pack-asses in one brief day; and he drinks the ten-amphora cask,^b calling it but a single measure."^c Such a hero, again, is the man in Nice People, by Pherecrates or Strattis, of whom it is said^d: "A. I can barely eat up five half-bushels a day, if I am forced thereto. B. Barely? What a little-feeder you are, then, after all! Why, you consume daily nearly enough rations for a cruiser!"^e Xanthus, in his History of Lydia, says^f that Camblês, the king of Lydia, was a hearty eater and hearty drinker, even a glutton. One night he butchered his own wife and ate her up, but in the morning, finding his wife's hand in his mouth, he cut his own throat, since the awful deed had become divulged. Concerning Thys, the king of the Paphlagonians, we have already said^g that he was a hearty eater, citing the account of Theopompus in the thirty-fifth book. And Archilochus in his Tetrameters attacks^h Charilas for similar gluttony, as the comic poets attack Cleonymus and Peisander.ⁱ Of Chaerippus Phoenicides speaks thus in The Colonel of Horse^j: "Third, and next to these, is the very clever Chaerippus. He, as you know, eats as long as anyone gives him food, or until he bursts before he knows it. He's got a storeroom inside as big as that of a house."

Nicolas the Peripatetic, in the one hundred and third book of his Histories, says ^a that Mithradates, the king of Pontus, got up a contest in eating and drinking, the prize being a talent in silver, and that he won in both events. He renounced the prize, however, in favour of the one who was adjudged second to him, Calamodrys the athlete from Cyzicus. Timocreon of Rhodes, also, poet and contestant in the pentathlon, ate and drank abundantly, as the inscription on his tomb shows ^b: "After much drinking, much eating, much abuse against mankind, I now lie dead, Timocreon of Rhodes." Thrasy-machus of Chalcedon, in one of his Preludes, says ^c that Timocreon went to the court of the Persian king and while being entertained by him filled himself with much food. Asked by the king what he proposed to do with such a start, he said he should give a thorough thrashing to countless Persians. Next day, after winning against many opponents, one by one, he began to spar. ^d When he was asked the reason for that, he replied that he still had left over an equal number of knock-out blows in case anyone wanted to meet him. Clearchus, in the fifth book of his Lives, ^e says that Cantibaris the Persian, whenever he tired his jaws out by eating, would open them wide and his servants would pump the food into him as into a lifeless vessel. Hellanicus, in the first book of The Tale of Deucalion, says^a that Erysichthon the son of Myrmidon was called the Fiery because he was insatiable when it came to food. And Polemon, in the first book of his Reply to Timaeus, says^b that among the Greeks of Sicily there is a shrine to Gluttony, and a statue of Demeter of the Grain, near which is set up one also to Our Lady of Abundance, like the statue of Eunostus^c in Delphi, and of Megalartus and Megalomazus in the Boeotian town of Scolus. Even the poet Alcman reveals himself as a glutton in these lines of the third book^d: "Yea, I will one day give thee the bowl of a tripod, wherein thou mayest gather food in heaps; even now it is unsmirched by fire, but soon it will be full of soup, such as greedy Alcman loved to eat warm after the solstice. For he eats not what is nicely prepared, but demands common things, like the rabble." And in the fifth book, also, he makes plain his own gluttony when he says^e: "Three seasons he placed in the year, summer and winter and the fruiting season third; and fourth is the spring, when there is bloom, to be sure, but not very much to eat." Talking about a certain Ctesias in his play, The Goldsmith, the comic poet Anaxilas says ^a: "By this time you have had about all there is, but not so Ctesias; for he, when it comes to a dinner, understands the beginning,^b as philosophers say, but is the only one who doesn't know the end." And in Rich Men ^c: "A. Damn any other fellow who eats a good dinner, and not Ctesias alone. B. (aside) What, really, is to hinder you from copying him^d? A. For when it comes to a dinner, he has learned the beginning, as the philosophers say, but has never yet learned the end." And in The Graces he includes a man named Cranaus in the same class with Ctesias, thus ^e: "No wonder that some people come up and ask me: 'Is it true that Cranaus eats up less than Ctesias, or do both of them dine copiously?' " Philetaerus in Atalanta ^f: "And if need be, I can speed along more miles than Sotades, and I will outdo Taureas at hard labour, and even outrun Ctesias in eating." Anaxippus in The Thunderbolt ^g: "A. Yes, I can see one of my friends coming towards me from the wrestling-school. It is Damippus. B. Do you mean that chap, the Feather-weight? A. Thunderbolt on account of his courage, you know. B. I don't wonder; for he can make the very dinner-tables sacred ground,^a I fancy, by swooping down upon them with his jaw." In these lines the comic poet has made it clear that he entitled his play, The Thunderbolt, from this character. Theophilus, in Epidaurus ^b: "There was a man named Atrestidas, a captain from Mantinea, who could eat more than all other men in the world." And in The Pancration-fighter Theophilus brought on the athlete as a man who ate a great deal, and says ^c: "A. Of boiled dishes there were nearly three pounds' weight. B. Tell us more! A. A snout, a ham, four pigs' feet. B. Heracles! A. Three ox-feet, and a fowl. B. Apollo! Tell us more. A. Two pounds of figs. B. And how much did you drink to top it all? A. A dozen half-pints of wine, neat. A. Apollo, Horus, and Sabazius!"

Entire nations, also, were satirized for gluttony, as for example the Boeotian. Eubulus, at any rate, says in Antiope ^d: "Quaff we and sup like right lusty fellows, and keep a stout heart; the Athenians, we say, shall eat but little, but Thebans abundantly." And in Europa ^e: "Establish the capital of the Boeotians, the best of men at eating all day long."

Are you speaking to a religious deputation, or to contestants?^c B. I am speaking to people who eat a great deal, as is the way of men in training. A. Where are the strangers from really? B. Boeotia.” In the light of this, it is natural that Eratosthenes also, in his Letters,^d should tell how Prepelaüs was once asked what he thought of the Boeotians; and that he answered: “What else can I think of them, than that they talked the kind of stuff that pots would talk if they acquired the power of speech, and said all they could severally contain?” Polybius of Megalopolis says, in the twentieth book of his Histories,^e that the Boeotians, after winning very great fame at the time of their victory at Leuctra,^f gradually relaxed in spirit, and devoting themselves to feasting and carousing they left in their wills money to their friends to found clubs.^g Many even among those who had kinsmen diverted the greater part of their property to their messmates, so that there were many Boeotians who enjoyed more dinners every month than there were days assigned to the month. Consequently the Megarians, who loathed that state of affairs among them, went over to the side of the Achaeans.

The Pharsalians, also, are satirized as gluttonous. Mnesimachus, for example, says in Philip^a: "A. Has any Pharsalian come to eat up everything, even the tables? B. Not one is here. A. I'm glad of that! I wonder whether they are eating up some roasted city of Achaea?" And that all Thessalians were charged with being gluttons is shown by Crates in Lamia^b: "Sesquipedalian words sliced in Thessalian fashion." He said this evidently because the Thessalians slice their meat in large portions. Philetaerus, also, in The Torch-bearers^c: "And a Thessalian cut off swine's flesh as heavy as your fist." They also called a morsel that was large "Thessalian." Hermippus in The Fates^d: "But Zeus, paying no attention to any of these matters, shut his eyes and fabricated some kind of Thessalian morsel." Such morsels are called "chariot-size" (kapanika) by Aristophanes in Masters of the Frying-pan^e: "A. How do the dinners of Thessalians compare with those of Lydians? B. Thessalian dinners are far more chariot-sized,"—as if he said, "as big as carts." For Thessalians call chariots kapanai. Xenarchus in The Scythians^f: "A. They kept seven chariots (kapanai) for the Olympic Games. B. What's that you say? Kapanai? What do you mean? A. All Thessalians call chariots kapanai. B. I understand."

Hecataeus says ^a the Egyptians were bread-eaters, eating kyllestis,^b while they ground up their barley to make a drink.^c Hence Alexinus, in his treatise On Independence, says that Bocchoris and his father Neochabis used but modest food. Pythagoras of Samos, also, used food in moderation, according to the account given by Lycon of Iasus in his work On the Life of Pythagoras. But he did not abstain from animal food, according to Aristoxenus. Apollodorus the mathematician even says that Pythagoras sacrificed a hecatomb to celebrate his discovery that in a right-angled triangle the hypotenuse squared is equal to the squares on the enclosing sides : "When Pythagoras discovered that famous line for which he gloriously offered a glorious sacrifice of oxen." Pythagoras was also given to drinking little, and led his whole life through with very little expense; often he was satisfied with honey only. Similar abstemiousness is recorded in the case of Aristides, of Epameinondas, Phocion, and Phormion, the well-known generals. Manius Curius, the Roman general, lived the whole time on turnips; and when the Sabines ^d sent him a large sum of gold, he said he had no need of gold so long as he dined on turnips. This is recorded by Megacles in his book On Famous Men.^e

For that matter, many persons welcome moderate bills of fare, as Alexis shows in The Girl who is in

And in Foster Brothers ^c: "How sweet is everything that is moderate; to-day I come away neither overstuffed nor empty, but pleasantly comfortable. For Mnesitheus ^d says that one should always avoid excesses in everything." The philosopher Ariston, in the second book of his Erotic Likenesses, says that Polemon the Academic advised all who went out to dinner to consider how they should indulge in their drinking so that it should be pleasant, not merely for the moment, but also on the day after. Timotheus, the son of Conon, accustomed though he was to the sumptuous dinners given in honour of generals, was invited by Plato to come to the banquet in the Academy; there he was entertained with simple and intellectual fare, and he said that people who dined in Plato's house felt all right the next day. Hegesander in his Commentaries said ^e that Timotheus met Plato the next day and remarked: "You and your friends, Plato, dine well, with an eye rather for the day after than for the immediate day." Pyrrhon of Elis, as the same author records, was once entertained by one of his disciples in sumptuous but vulgar fashion, and he said: "Hereafter I shall not come to your house if you entertain in that way, for I don't want to have the pain of seeing you act the prodigal unnecessarily, nor do I want you to suffer in straitened circumstances. For it is more decent for us to be satisfied with our own company than with overabundance of courses, most of which is wasted by the servants." Antigonus of Carystus, describing in his Life of Menedemus^a the arrangements for the symposium at the philosopher's house, says that he took a light meal^b in company with only one or two others; the result was that the others were obliged to dine at home before they came. For that was in fact the kind of meal Menedemus provided. After that he would call into the dining-room those who had arrived; some of these, it appeared, whenever they arrived before the set time, would walk up and down in front of the house-door and inquire of the slaves as they came out what dish was being served, and how far along in time the luncheon had progressed. Whenever they heard that the dish was a green vegetable or some smoked fish, they would go back home; but when they heard it was a bit of meat, they would enter the room which had been prepared for the occasion. In summer there was provided a mat on every couch, in winter a sheepskin; but each guest had to bring his own cushion. The loving-cup that went round the room was not larger than a half-pint measure, the dessert was habitually a lupine or a bean, though sometimes also a seasonable fruit was brought in—in summer a pear or a pomegranate, in spring dried peas, in the wintry season dried figs. Lycophron of Chalcis also testifies to this; he wrote a satyr-play Menedemus, in which Silenus says to the satyrs ^a: "Ye most execrable children of mightiest Pan, I can exult over you, as ye see; for the gods are my witness, never in Caria, nor in Rhodes, nor in Lydia have I dined on such a dinner as that I have inside me. Apollo, it was fine!" And proceeding ^b: "But the slave passed round a meagre, watery cup of wine worth only five pence, and slightly soured; and the damnable plebeian lupine danced forth in lavish abundance, that companion of the paupers' triclinium." Lycophron next says that questions ^c were put in the course of the drinking ^d: "For the dessert served to all was moralizing converse." It is recorded also that many a time, when the company stayed a long time, "the bird that announces the dawn overtook them, but they were not yet sated."

Arcesilaus gave a dinner to some friends and the bread gave out. When the slave, with a wink, indicated that there was no more, he burst into a loud laugh, and clapping his hands he said, "What a dinner are we giving, my friends! We have forgotten to buy enough loaves of bread. Run and get some, slave." This he would say while he laughed himself, so that a unanimous burst of laughter poured forth from those who were present, and the amusement and joking that fell upon them were increased ; the result was that the lack of bread became the spice of the dinner. On another occasion Arcesilaus told his disciple Apelles to strain the wine ; but he, being inexperienced, roiled some of it and spilled the rest, and the wine proved to be much more turbid than it had been ; with a gentle smile Arcesilaus said : " I have told a man to strain wine who has not seen what the Good is any more than I have. Do you, then, Arideices, get up and strain it ; as for you, Apelles, go home and try to probe the true qualities of things." ^a This so cheered and exhilarated the company that they were filled with mirth.

People who gather for dinner-parties to-day, especially if they come from fair Alexandria, shout, bawl, and objurgate the wine-pourer, the waiter, and the chef ; the slaves are in tears, being buffeted by knuckles right and left. To say nothing of the guests, who thus dine in complete embarrassment ; if the occasion happen to be a religious festival, even the god will cover his face and depart, abandoning not only the house but also the entire city. Surely it is ridiculous that the very man who has proclaimed holy silence ^b should then curse his wife and his children. Such a person might say to the people at dinner, ^c " But now go to your dinner, that we may join battle." For such a man's house " at the same time is full of incense, at the same time rings with prayers for health and cries of woe." ^d

^a τὰ ἐκτά is thought to be corrupt ; it may have suggested to the company τὰ ἐκτός, " things outside."

^b " Let there be holy silence " was the formula before a sacrifice.

After these quotations one of the company said: "Looking at these examples, we must deprecate stuffing the belly. 'For a frugal dinner causes no drunken violence,' as Amphis says in Pan,^a nor again deeds of outrage and insults, as Alexis testifies in these lines from Odysseus at the Loom ^b: 'A. The long drawn-out party, the many dinners occurring day after day, give occasion for derision, and derision causes far more pain than pleasure. For it is the beginning of abuse; and once you utter an abuse, you are immediately abused in turn; there's nothing left but insult. Next blows come to light, and drunken brawling. B. Yes, for these occur in natural sequence just so; and what need were there of a prophet to tell us?' Mnesimachus, also, in Philip, impelled by the excessive satiety observed in dinner-parties, introduces a banquet which was veritably, as Xenophon puts it most neatly, the 'workshop of war.'^c Mnesimachus says ^d: 'Don't you know that you've got to fight against us men who dine on swords freshly sharpened, and who, instead of an entrée, eat up lighted torches? Immediately after that the slave, after dinner, brings on a dessert in the form of Cretan arrows instead of chickpeas, broken rem-bread, but not broth, else you will spoil it. Into a basket you will put barley-cakes, but not lentil-soup; you will put wine in your flask, but not a crayfish. Yet into this god-hated stomach you pour all things that don't agree with one another. I add not the rest, because, the whole world over, all these things I have mentioned happen on account of the unhappy stomach.' The cynic Crates, also, as Sosicrates says in his Successions,^a castigated Demetrius of Phalerum because he had sent him a flask of wine with his wallet of bread; said he: 'Would that the springs might produce bread as well as water ^b!' And Stilpo had nothing to fear from his abstemiousness when he ate garlic and then lay down to sleep in the temple of the Mother of the Gods; yet it was forbidden one who had eaten any thing like that even so much as to enter the temple. And so, when the goddess appeared before him in his sleep and said, 'Are you a philosopher, Stilpo, and yet transgress our laws?' to certain wine-pourers, we have two fountains beside us, one of which, the fountain of pleasure, one might liken to honey ; the other, the sobering and wineless fountain of wisdom, to a well of homely and healthful water ; these we must mix in the best possible way.' It is time, then, that we were drinking, and so let one of the slaves fetch some cups from the sideboard ; for I see a large number of beautifully decorated drinking-cups." When, then, a large cup had been given him Ulpian said : " Fill your ladle, slave, with stronger wine and pour it into my cup ; not as the comic poet Antiphanes has it, who says in The Twins ^a : ' He took and brought the big cup to me, and I made him pour in unmixed wine : " Pour, slave, ten thousand ladles-full in honour of gods and goddesses ; then, to top them all, pour in a double portion to the august goddess and our sweetest king." ' For me, then, boy, ' mix it stronger ' ^b ; for I do not yet speak of the number of ladles. ^c But I will show that the word cyathus (ladle) is in good use, also the term ' stronger, ' ^d and then I will speak of wine-pourers. And first I shall treat for good and all the term zoroteron. Antiphanes in Melanion ^e : ' I sentence him to drink a cup to the goddess of health after the hand-washing, using a stronger wine-pourer.' Recruits^a: 'He mixed and gave each girl a stronger cup in Homeric style.' Some authorities say that the phrase in Homer,^b 'Mix it stronger,' does not indicate unmixed wine, but warm wine, deriving zoroteron from zotikon (lively) and zesis (boiling); for when friends appear it is not unusual to have a fresh bowl mixed over again. Others say it means 'well-mixed,' using a comparative instead of a positive form, like dexiteron (right-hand side) for dexion.^c But some again, since years are called oroi, and the prefix za signifies largeness or number, maintain that zoros means 'many years old.' Diphilus says in Paederasts^d: 'A. You there, pour us out a drink. B. Heavens, boy, give it to us stronger! For everything that is watery is an evil to the soul.'^e Theophrastus, in his treatise On Drunkenness, says^f that anything that is mixed is called zoroteron, citing these words of Empedocles^g: 'Forthwith things mortal came into being, which before they understood to be immortal, and things mixed that before were unmixed, exchanging their paths.' The word cyathus, moreover, is used by Plato in Phaon of the cup used for ladling, thus^h: 'Having taken the ladle (cyathus) to their lips in this fashion.' And in *Envoys*ⁱ: 'How many ladles the two were stealing every time.'

Archippus in The Fishes^a: 'I bought a ladle from Daesias.' Some such thing also is what we have in The Peace of Aristophanes^b: 'All of them without exception having been dealt a black eye, to which cupping-glasses had been applied.' For the parts below the eyes are blackened when violently struck by cups. The cup (ladle) is mentioned also by Xenophon in the first book of his Education,^c and by Cratinus; again by Aristophanes in many places, and by Eubulus in Orthannes.^d Pherecrates, in Frills, mentioned a 'golden cup.'^e Timon, in the second book of his Satires, calls these cups arysaenae, thus^f: 'Cups insatiate in wine,' calling them so from the verb arysasthai (draw). But they are also called arysteres and arystichoi. Simonides^g: 'No one gave so much as a ladle-full (aryster) of lees.' Aristophanes in The Wasps^h: 'For I had these ladles (arystichoi) all the while.' Phrynichus in *The Weeders*ⁱ: 'A drinking-cup used as a ladle (arystichos).' From the same verb comes also arytaena (ladle). They also called such a vessel ephebus,^j as does Zenophanes in Akin. Polybius, in the ninth book of the Histories,^k records a river named Cyathus in the neighbourhood of Arsinoë, a city of Aetolia. As for the word akra-testeron, Hypereides uses that in the speech Against

So Alcaeus in Sacred Marriage ^h: 'They mix and make away with.' Hypereides in the speech On Delos ⁱ: 'All Greeks in common mix the bowl which is called "the healing."' Further, the boys of the best families acted as wine-pourers among the ancients, like the son of Menelaus ^j: 'And the son of glorious Menelaus poured the wine.' Even the poet Euripides, when a schoolboy, was a wine-pourer. Theophrastus, at any rate, says in his treatise On Drunkenness ^k: 'I, at least, have heard that the poet Euripides acted as wine-pourer at Athens for the so-called Dancers.' by Hieronymus of Rhodes, who was a disciple of Aristotle, writing also in his treatise On Drunkenness. And so the fair Sappho in many places praises her brother Larichus as a wine-pourer in the town-hall of the Mitylenaeans. Among the Romans, too, the noblest-born lads perform this service in the festivals celebrated at public cost, in all things imitating the Aeolians, as, for example, even down to the tones of their voices. So great was the luxury of older times in regard to their sumptuous entertainments that they had wine-inspectors as well as wine-pourers. At any rate the wine-inspectors are officials at Athens, mentioned by Eupolis in these lines from The Island-towns ^a: 'Men whom you wouldn't have chosen even to be your wine-inspectors in the old days, we now have as leaders of the army. O my city, my city! How lucky thou art, rather than wise!' These wine-inspectors superintended the arrangements at dinners to see that the members of the company drank equal quantities. The office was in low repute, as the orator Philinus shows in The Settlement of the Croconid Case ^b; he says they were three in number, and they supplied lamps and wicks to the diners. Some people even called them 'eyes.' Among the Ephesians the wine-pouring bachelors at the festival of Poseidon were called bulls, according to Amerias. Hellespontians call the wine-pourer epenchytes (forth-pourer) and the distribution of meat kreodaisia (meat-division), as Demetrius of Scepsis says in the twenty-sixth book of his Trojan Battle-order.^c Some record Harmonia as pouring wine for the gods, according to the account given by the epic poet Capito, a native of Alexandria, in the second book of his Love Stories. Alcaeus introduces ^a Hermes also as their wine-pourer, as does Sappho when she says ^b: 'There stood a mixing-bowl filled with ambrosia, while Hermes grasped the pitcher to serve the gods.' But in olden times they called those who were appointed for this service heralds. Homer ^c: 'And heralds were bearing through the city the binding oath-offerings to the gods, two lambs, and wine, the fruit of the glebe that makes the heart merry, in a goat-skin vessel; and the herald Idaeus bore the shining mixing-bowl and the golden cups.' And again ^d: 'And lordly heralds gathered the binding oath-offerings of the gods, and in the bowl they mixed the wine, and poured water over the princes' hands.' Cleidemus says ^e the cooks were called heralds. But poets have imagined Hebe as the wine-pourer to the gods, perhaps because symposia were called hebeteria.^f Cleino, the female wine-pourer of King Ptolemy surnamed Philadelphus, is mentioned by Ptolemy the son of Agesarchus in the third book of his Inquiries relating to Philopator.^g Polybius, in the fourteenth book of his Histories, says ^h that statues of her stood in many parts of the city of Alexandria, Upon these words Ulpian, as he drained his cup, said: "' This cup, naming you all at once, I pledge to the full, a faithful token of love to my kinsmen.' " In answer to him, while he was still drinking, one of the company capped him with the remaining iambic lines: "' When I've finished drinking, I will tell you the rest; for I am choking. B. Then swallow it in sips.' " And when Ulpian had finished drinking he said: " These lines are from Clearchus, in The Harp-singer.^a As for me, quoting The Toilers of Amphis, I make this exhortation^b: ' Let the slave ply the guests in many rounds with the cups.' And again: ' Fill up for me, and I will give you to drink; let almond sport by the side of almond.' This last is said by Xenarchus in The Twins.^c " Some, then, demanded that more wine be added to the mixture, others said half and half; and another remarked that Archippus had said, in the second edition of his Amphitryo^d: " Which of you two, you poor fool, has mixed it half and half? " And Cratinus in The Wine-flask^e: " The drink that carries half and half! As for me, I pine away." So it was agreed by all that they should discuss the mixtures of wine among the ancients. And one remarked that Menander had said, in The Hero ^a: "A pitcher of mixed wine; take and drink it down." Then Democritus said: "Hesiod,^b my comrades, advises us 'to pour forth thrice of the water, and to put in the fourth part of wine.' On his account Anaxilas also said in Nereus ^c: 'And yet surely it is far pleasanter. For I should never be drinking three parts of water, and only one of wine.' But Alexis in The Nurse urges a still more temperate mixture ^d: 'A. Look, here is wine. Shall I pour a "Triton" ^e? B. No, it's much better as one and four. A. Too watery, that! However, drink it up and tell me the news; let's have some conversation while we drink.' And Diocles in The Bees ^f: 'A. How is the wine to be mixed that I am to drink? B. Four and two.' This last mixture, certainly, being contrary to custom, presently brought to mind the oft-repeated proverb, 'Drink either five or three or at least not four.' For they say one should drink two parts wine to five of water, or one part wine to three of water. In regard to this mixture, the poet Ion, in his work On Chios,^g says: 'The seer Palamedes prophesied that the Greeks would have a speedy voyage if they drank three cups to one.' But others, who adopted a stronger mixture ^a in their potions, drank two parts of wine to five of water. Nicochares, for example, alluding in Amymone to the name Oenomaus,^b said ^c: 'Here, Oenomaus, your health in a five and two! May you and I be drinkers together.' He has similar lines also in The Lemnian Women.^d So Ameipsias in Playing at Cottabus ^e: 'I am Dionysus for you all, mixed five and two.' Eupolis in Goats ^f: 'Hail, Dionysus! Do you come with the taste of five and two?' Hermippus in The Gods ^g: 'Again, whenever we drink or are thirsty we pray, to meet the emergency, "Now my drinking-horn, turn into wine!" Then I carry it to the wine-merchant's, joking the while, and soon it has turned into five and two.' But in Anacreon we have one cup of wine to two of water ^h: 'Up then, my boy, and hand us a cup, that I may pledge a deep draught, pouring in ten cups of water and five of wine; for I want to celebrate Bacchus again with all decorum.' And going on, he calls the drinking of unmixed wine

a Scythian potion : ‘ Up then once more ; let us no longer, amid clatter and shouting, practise a Scythian potion at our wine, but drink it calmly amid noble hymns of praise.’ And so the Lacedaemonians assert, according to Herodotus in the sixth book,^a that their king Cleomenes, after associating with Scythians, became a drinker of unmixed wine and as a result of this dissipation he went mad. The Laconians themselves, therefore, whenever they want to drink a stronger ^b mixture, call it ‘ drinking Scythian fashion.’ Chamaeleon of Heracleia, for example, in his book On Drunkenness, writes of them thus ^c : ‘ For the Laconians say that Cleomenes the Spartiate went mad from learning to drink unmixed wine after associating with Scythians. Hence, whenever they wish to drink a stronger mixture, they say, “ make it Scythian ! ” ’ Achæus in Aethon, a satyric drama,^d represents the satyrs as indignant at drinking watery wine, and saying : ‘ A. It can’t be, can it, that the water ^e was mixed in it too copiously ? B. Why, it isn’t lawful for our race even so much as to lick it. A. No ! Right it were to celebrate with a Scythian drink.’ ^f

“ Now the practice of giving toasts among the participants in the entertainment, as Theophrastus says in his treatise On Drunkenness,^g was not known of old ; on the contrary, in the beginning the libation was reserved for the gods, while the cottabus was the instrument whereby lovers were honoured. fact they were assiduously devoted to the cottabus, which was a Sicilian game, as Anacreon of Teos has represented it ^a: 'With bended arm making the Sicilian cottabus ring.' ^b Hence the songs of the ancient poets which we call 'scolia' ^c are full of it; I refer to the kind which Pindar composed ^d: '... the charms of love inspired by Aphrodite, that I may carouse in company with Cheimarus, and shoot the cottabus in honour of Agathon.' To deceased friends they assigned the pieces of food which fell from the table; hence Euripides says of Stheneboea, when she imagines that Bellerophon is dead ^e: 'Nothing that falls from her hand escapes her notice; no, she straightway cries, "To the Corinthian stranger."' "

"Men of old did not get drunk; even Pittacus advised Periander of Corinth not to get drunk and not to revel, 'in order,' so he said, 'that you may not be recognized as the sort of man you happen to be, instead of the sort you pretend to be.' For 'bronze is the mirror of the outward form, wine the mirror of the mind.' ^f Hence those who speak in proverbs well say that wine has no rudder. court of Dionysius of Sicily, and when the wine-pourer insisted that he should drink, he addressed the tyrant by name and said: 'Why, Dionysius, does not your cook, who is a good and versatile one, likewise compel us, when we are at dinner, to eat if we do not wish to, instead of setting the table for us in decent silence?' So also Sophocles in a satyric drama says ^a that, after all, 'to drink against one's will is an evil as great as being a-thirst.' Hence the common saying ^b: 'Wine bids an old man to dance even against his will.' So the poet Sthenelus says not ineptly: 'Wine moves even the wise to acts of folly.' And Phocylides said ^c: 'It behooves one at a symposium, as the cups go round and round, to sit and chat pleasantly while he drinks his wine.' This custom of sitting remains to this day among some Greeks.^d But when they began to luxuriate and have degenerate manners, they slid from chairs to couches, and taking as their ally relaxation and ease, from this time on they indulged in the carouse in lax and disorderly fashion, being seduced into pleasure, I fancy, by their rich surroundings. Hence Hesiod says in Eoëae ^e: 'How hath Dionysus given unto men both joy and pain, when one drinketh abundantly; and wine hath come raging upon him and binds feet and hands together, tongue and reason in bonds unforeseen; then soft sleep embraces him.' Theognis, also, says^a: 'I shall come even as the wine that is pleasantest to drink; I am neither sober nor am I too much in my cups. But he, whosoever he be, who exceedeth measure in drinking, hath no longer power over his own tongue or his reason; he babbles recklessly of things which in sober men's eyes are scandalous; he scruples not to do anything when in his cups, though before he was discreet and gentle. Do thou not, then, knowing this, drink wine to excess, but ere thou begin to be drunk, rise up and depart; let not thy belly do violence to thee as to some base day-labouring thrall.' The wise Anacharsis, too, explaining to the Scythian chieftain the virtue of the vine, and showing the cuttings from it, told him that they would already have reached even the Scythians did not the Greeks prune them every year.^b

"Wrongful, then, is the method of those who represent Dionysus in sculpture and in painting, and also those who carry him in the cart through the middle of the market-place, in a state of drunkenness. For they thus prove to the spectators that wine is too potent even for the god. And yet surely, I fancy, no good man would tolerate that notion. But if they represent him in such a state because he revealed wine to us, then it is plain they will represent Demeter in the act of reaping or eating.

I venture to assert that even Aeschylus erred in this; for he, and not, as some declare, Euripides, was the first to introduce the spectacle of drunken men into tragedy. In The Cabiri, namely, he represents Jason and his companions as drunk.^a What the tragedian was in the habit of doing himself, that he has fastened upon the heroes: he was drunk when he wrote his tragedies. Hence Sophocles said to him in criticism, 'Aeschylus, though you write as you should, nevertheless you write so without knowing it'; so records Chamaeleon in his work On Aeschylus.^b They who say (this about Aeschylus) are unaware that Epicharmus was the first to bring a drunken man on the stage, and after him, Crates in Neighbours.^c Alcaeus the lyric poet and Aristophanes the comic poet also were drunk when they composed their works, and many other persons have contended in battle more gloriously when in a state of inebriety. Among the Western Locrians, if anyone drank unmixed wine without a physician's prescription to effect a cure, the penalty was death under the code instituted by Zaleucus. Among the people of Massilia there was another law compelling women to drink only water. In Miletus, also, Theophrastus says^d that this is customary even to-day. Among the Romans neither a slave nor a free-born woman could drink wine, neither could the young men of the free class up to thirty years of age.^e But Anacreon, who made all his poetry depend upon the subject of intoxication, is a singular case. For he is maligned for having given himself over in his poems to laxity and luxury, though the many do not know that he was sober while engaged in composing, and that, being an upright man, he merely pretends to be drunk, though there is no necessity for his being so.

“Those who are ignorant of the influence of wine allege that Dionysus is the cause of fits of madness among mankind; they blaspheme beyond all measure. Hence Melanippides said ^a: ‘All abhorred water, though before they had known no wine. Soon then, right soon, some of them utterly perished, while others poured forth frenzied voices.’ Aristotle says in the work On Drunkenness ^b: ‘If wine be boiled down moderately, the drinking of it is less apt to cause intoxication; for the potency of it when boiled down becomes weaker. Older men, he continues, become intoxicated soonest because of the slightness and weakness of the natural heat contained within them. But very young persons also become intoxicated rather quickly because of the large amount of heat within them; for they are easily overpowered by the heat which is added from the wine. Among dumb animals, also, hogs become drunk when fed with masses of pressed grapes,^c also ravens and dogs ^d if they have eaten the wine-plant, so-called; the monkey and the elephant, too, if they drink wine. Hence hunters effect the capture of monkeys and ravens by getting them drunk, the first with wine, the second with the wine-plant.’

It robs a man of his reason when he is still alive, and reason is the greatest boon our human nature has acquired.' And Alexis, in the revised edition of The Phrygian, says ^a: 'If the headache only came to us before we drink to intoxication, no one would ever indulge himself in wine immoderately. But as it is, foreseeing not that punishment for drunkenness will come, we readily give ourselves over to drinking unmixed cups.' Aristotle says ^b that the so-called Samagorean wine, when a bowl is prepared with only three half-pints of it mixed (with the water), can make more than forty men drunk."

When Democritus had finished these remarks,^c he took a drink and continued: "If anyone can gainsay these facts, let him come forward. He shall hear, indeed, as Evcnus puts it ^d: 'To you these things may seem so to be, but to me they seem otherwise.' But since my talk on the mixtures of wine in old times caused me to digress, I will resume my main topic, recalling to mind the lines written by the lyric poet Alcaeus. For he says somewhere ^e: 'Pour it out, mixing it one and two.' In these words, to be sure, some authorities think that he is not speaking of the mixture of the wine, but that, being given to sobriety, he drank unmixed wine only at the rate of a single, and again a double, half-pint each time.^f This is the way in which Chamaeleon of Pontus takes it, but he is ignorant of Alcaeus's bibulousness. likely that he who was so fond of drinking should be given to sobriety, and drink only one or two cups at a time? The poem itself, at any rate, says Seleucus, testifies against those who take the line in this meaning. For the poet says ^a: 'Let us drink! Why wait we for the lamps? Daylight hath but a finger's breadth. Boy, take down the large painted cups; for the son of Semele and Zeus gave wine to men to banish care. Pour it out, mixing it one and two, full to the brim ^b; ay, let one cup thrust the other out of the way.' Here he expressly orders one cup of wine to be mixed with two of water. Yet Anacreon requires it still stronger in the lines where he says ^c: 'Let it be poured out, five and three, in a clean cup.' But Philetaerus in Tereus has two parts of water to three of neat wine. He says ^d: 'He seems to have drunk the mixture made at the rate of two parts water to three of neat wine.' Pherecrates in Corianno has two of water to four of wine, when he says ^e: 'A. It's undrinkable, Glyce. B. What, did she pour it out too watery for you? A. Watery! It's nothing but water. B. (to Glyce). What have you done? How, you confounded idiot, did you pour it? GLYCE. Two parts of water, mammy. B. How much wine? GLYCE. Four parts. B. (in-

And in Supposititious^a: 'I drained it without stopping to take breath, with all the pleasure that one could have, mixed half and half.' Menander in Brothers^b: 'Someone kept bawling out to pour eight cups and twelve, until in eager competition he utterly floored the others.' Now the word 'to floor'^c was said of persons proposing toasts at drinking-bouts, the figure being borrowed from those who shake down fruits. Alexis says, in Cut Loose^d: 'Really, Chaereas was no toast-master, but rather a public executioner; for he proposed twenty cups.' And Diodorus of Sinope in The Flute-girl^e: 'Whenever a man has drunk ten cups, Crito, with every cup that he drinks continuously thereafter, he always spews up his powers of reason. Think that over and apply it to yourself.' Not inelegantly did the Spartiate Lysander, according to Hegesander in his Commentaries,^f when the hucksters were selling watery wine in the camp, order them to sell it as already mixed, because he wanted them to buy it stronger. Alexis also says the like in Aesop^g: 'A. This, at least, is an ingenious custom with you in Athens, Solon, and cleverly invented. SOLON. And what is that? A. In your symposia you don't drink unmixed wine. SOLON. No, for it isn't easy; they sell it from their carts already mixed, not to make a profit but with forethought for the purchasers, that they may have sound heads after a drunken bout. This, you see, is the Greek way of drinking; by using cups in moderation, they can talk and fool with each other pleasantly. For the other way, drinking from coolers and casks, is a bath, not a drinking-bout. A. It's death, rather !'

" Plato says in the sixth book of The Laws ^a : ' To drink to the point of intoxication is not proper to any other occasion except the festivals in honour of the god who gave the wine, and it is not safe ; neither is it appropriate at the time when one is seriously engaged in the business of marriage, wherein, more than at any other time, bride and groom ought to be in their sound senses, since they are undergoing no little change in their lives ; and at the same time, because their offspring ought in all cases to be born of sound-minded parents. For it is well-nigh impossible to say what night or what day will generate it.' And in the first book of The Laws ^b he says : ' (I am speaking) of intoxication itself, as practised by Lydians, Persians, Carthaginians, Celts, Iberians, Thracians, and such tribes ; while you, Lacedaemonians, utterly abstain from it. Now the Scythians and Thracians drink nothing but unmixed wine, their wives as well as all the men ; they pour it over their clothes and think that they practise a noble and happy custom. The Persians also indulge excessively in all other kinds of luxury which you reject, although in more orderly fashion than the peoples I have mentioned.'

Many used to drink with barley-meal sprinkled upon their wine, as Hegesander of Delphi says.^a Mnesiptolemus, at any rate, once gave a reading of his Histories,^b in which it was recorded that Seleucus sprinkled barley-meal on wine, and Epinicus wrote a play called Mnesiptolemus in which he ridiculed him, and employing the terms used by Mnesiptolemus concerning drinking, represented him as saying^c : ‘ One summer I saw King Seleucus eagerly drinking his wine with barley ; so I have recorded it and have shown the public that, however ordinary or trivial a little deed may be, this power of mine can make it important. Said the king : “ Thasian wine, well aged, and the sweet cell of the irascible bee from Attic land, have I turbinated^d in a bowl of fused stone, bridging o’er the whole wavy surface with Demeter’s grain^e ; thus did I consume the drink, a relief from the heat.” ’ Hegesander records also that in the Therad islands the people drink wine with pulse instead of barley-meal sprinkled on it, and it is said (so he asserts) that this drink is better than that made from barley.

“ It was not the custom of the Spartans to practise the drinking of toasts which occur in banquets, nor to institute by these means loving-cups pledged to one another. Critias makes this clear in his Elegies^f : ‘ This also is a custom at Sparta and a set practice, to drink from the same^g wine-bearing cup, and not to give toasts, pledging them by name, nor send them round in the circle of the party from left hand to right.^a (But among the Athenians it is different.) Bowls they have, which a Lydian hand, Asiatic-born, invented; toasts, too, they pass from left to right, and they challenge by name him whom one wishes to pledge.^b Then, after draughts of this kind they loosen their tongues to tell scandalous stories, and they enfeeble their bodies; upon their eyes a dark mist settles, and oblivion melts away memory from their wits; reason wanders completely away; the slaves have undisciplined habits; extravagance that wastes the household store descends upon them. But the warriors of Sparta drink only enough to lead the spirits of all into joyous hope, the tongue to kindliness and moderate laughter. Such drinking is good for the body, mind, and estate; well is it suited to acts of love, and to further sleep, that haven from toil; to invite, too, Hygieia, most delightsome of gods to mortals, and Sobriety, the neighbour of Reverence.' Again he says in continuation: 'For the pledging of cups beyond the proper measure, though they delight for the moment, brings pain for all time. But the Spartan mode of living is ordered equably,—eating and drinking in measure, they have power to think and to labour; no day is set apart to intoxicate the body with immoderate potations.'

"A 'philoinos' (wine-lover) is one who is ever ready for wine, a 'philopotês' (drink-lover) is ready for drinking-bouts, a 'kothonist' (cup-addict) is one who drinks to intoxication. Of the Homeric heroes the triply-aged Nestor drank most. He himself made no secret of being more devoted to wine than the others, even more than Agamemnon himself, whom Achilles assails as a drink-lover.^a But Nestor, even when the most important battle was at its height, did not abstain from drinking. At least Homer says ^b: 'But the cry of battle did not escape Nestor, although he was drinking.' And among all the heroes his cup only is described,^c like the shield of Achilles.^d For he went on the expedition with it as he did with his shield, the fame of which, Hector says,^e had reached even to Heaven. One would make no mistake if he called Nestor's cup 'the saucer of Ares,'^f as Antiphanes does in Caeneus, wherein it is said ^g: 'Then give me forth-with the saucer of Ares, as Timotheus calls it,^h and polished dart.' What is more, Nestor, because of his love of drinking, receives another cup from Achilles as a present, on the occasion of the games celebrated in honour of Patroclusⁱ; not that Achilles gave a cup to a beaten man, since Nestor had not entered the contest (victory, indeed, is not apt to attend drink-lovers on account of their lethargy);

"No desire is more insistent than the desire to drink. Hence the Poet called Argos 'very thirsty,' that is, 'much desired,' on account of the long lapse of time.^c For thirst causes in everyone a powerful desire for abundant satisfaction. Hence also Sophocles says^d: 'Though you offered a thirsty man all sorts of wise conceits, you could not give him greater joy than by giving him a drink.' And Archilochus^e: 'As one thirsting for a drink, so I desire a fight with you.' And one of the tragic poets has said^f: 'I bid you stay the hand that thirsts for blood.' And Anacreon^g: 'For you are a kindly woman toward strangers; let me, who am athirst, drink.' Xenophon, in the third book of his Education, makes Cyrus say^h: 'I thirst to do you favours.' deal, as Ehippus says in his work On the Funeral of Alexander and Hephaestion,^a and enjoyed a sturdy physique throughout his life, although he was completely devoted to the practice of drinking. Alexander, for example, once called for a six-quart cup and after a drink proposed the health of Proteas. He took the cup, and when he had sung the king's praises he drank, to the applause of everybody. A little while afterwards Proteas demanded the same cup, and again drinking, pledged the king. Alexander took it and pulled at it bravely, but could not hold out; on the contrary, he sank back on his cushion and let the cup drop from his hands. As a result, he fell ill and died, because, as Ehippus says, Dionysus was angry at him for besieging his native city, Thebes. Alexander also drank a very great deal, so that after the spree he would sleep continuously for two days and two nights. This is revealed in his Journals, written by Eumenes of Cardia and Diodotus of Erythrae.^b Menander says in The Flatterer ^c: 'BIAS. In Cappadocia, Struthias, I drank up three times a golden beaker^d holding ten half-pints. STRUTHIAS. Then you have drunk more than King Alexander. B. Not less, that's certain, by Athena! s. It's a good deal, to be sure.' And Nicobulê, or whoever ascribed to her the compilations, says ^e that when Alexander was dining with Medeius of Thessaly he pledged the health of everyone at the dinner, there being twenty in all, and accepted the same number of toasts from all ; he then left the party and soon after went to sleep. But the sophist Callisthenes, according to Lynceus of Samos in his Reminiscences and Aristobulus and Chares in their Histories,^a pushed aside the cup of unmixed wine when it came to him at Alexander's symposium, and when somebody said to him, ' Why don't you drink ? ' he replied, ' I don't want to be in need of one of Asclepius's cups ^b after drinking from one of Alexander's.'

" Darius, the destroyer of the Magi,^c had an inscription written on his tomb : ' I could drink much wine and yet carry it well.' Ctesias says ^d that in India it is not permitted the king to get drunk. But among the Persians the king is allowed to get drunk on one day, that on which they sacrifice to Mithra. On this point Duris, in the seventh book of his Histories, writes as follows ^e : ' In only one of the festivals celebrated by the Persians, that to Mithra, the king gets drunk and dances " the Persian " ; no one else throughout Asia does this, but everyone abstains on this day from the dance. For Persians learn how to dance just as they learn to ride horseback ; and they think the motion incident to this practice ^f is very suitable for getting exercise to develop bodily strength.' Alexander carried his carousing to such a point, according to Carystius of Pergamum in Historical Notes,^g that he even went revelling in a chariot drawn by asses ; the Persian kings did this too, Carystius says ; perhaps, therefore, it was for this reason that he had no appetite for sexual indulgence ; for Aristotle, in his Physical Problems, says^a that the semen of such persons becomes watery ; so Hieronymus, in his Epistles,^b quotes Theophrastus as saying that Alexander was not in good condition for sexual commerce. Olympias, at any rate, and Philip were aware of this, and actually caused the Thessalian courtesan Callixeina, who was a very beautiful woman, to lie with him ; for they feared he might prove to be a womanish man, and Olympias often begged him to have intercourse with Callixeina.

“ Philip, Alexander’s father, was another drink-lover, as Theopompus records in the twenty-sixth book of his Histories.^c And in another part of the story he writes^d : ‘ Philip was a madcap and inclined to rush headlong into danger, partly by nature and partly because of drink ; for he was a deep drinker, and was often drunk when he sallied into battle.’ And in the fifty-third book, after relating the events at Chaeroneia and telling how Philip had invited to dinner the Athenian ambassadors who had arrived, Theopompus continues^e : ‘ When they had withdrawn, Philip immediately sent for some of his boon companions, and told them to summon the flute-girls, Aristonicus the harp-singer, Dorion the flute-player, and all the rest of the crowd accustomed to drink with him ; for Philip took such persons with him everywhere,^f and he was always equipped with many tools for a drinking-bout and a party. Being, in fact, a drink-lover and quite dissolute in character, he also had many coarse fellows in his train, as well as many who were versed in music or who could say funny things. And so, after drinking the whole night through, and getting very drunk and committing every folly, he dismissed all the rest of the company and made them withdraw, while he, as dawn was coming on, went to revel with the Athenian ambassadors.' So Carystius in his Historical Notes says ^a: 'When Philip made up his mind to get drunk, he used to say, "Now we must drink; for it is enough that Antipater is sober." And once when he was throwing dice, and someone announced that Antipater had arrived, he debated for a while and then pushed the gaming-board under the couch.'

"Theopompus gives a list of drink-lovers and sots, including Dionysius the Younger, tyrant of Sicily, who, he says, ruined his eyesight with wine. So Aristotle, in The Constitution of Syracuse, says ^b that sometimes Dionysius was drunk continuously for ninety days; hence his eyesight became rather dimmed. And Theophrastus says that his companions, in their flattery of his autocratic rule, pretended not to be able to see, and had their hands guided by Dionysius himself, pretending to see neither the food set before them nor the wine-cups; ^c hence they were called 'Dionysius-flatterers.' Nysaeus, also, who assumed tyrannical rule over Syracuse, drank a very great deal, as did Apollocrates; they were sons of the first Dionysius, as Theopompus records in the fortieth and following books of his Histories.^d He writes thus concerning Nysaeus: 'Nysaeus, who later became tyrant of Syracuse, as though he had been

And in the thirty-ninth book Theopompus says ^a: 'Apollocrates, the son of the tyrant Dionysius, was dissolute and drink-loving; and some of his flatterers tricked him into the utmost possible hostile attitude toward his father.' He also says that Hipparinus, the son of Dionysius, was assassinated because he ruled in drunkenness. Concerning Nysaeus he writes further ^a: 'When Nysaeus, the son of the first Dionysius, had become master of Syracusan affairs, he caused to be made a four-horse chariot and assumed gaily-embroidered garments; further, he took to luxurious eating and guzzling, the outraging of young boys and of women, and the practice of all other indulgences which naturally contribute to these, and lived his life accordingly.' In the forty-fifth book Theopompus again says, speaking of Timolaus of Thebes ^b: 'Not a few persons, indeed, have before this proved licentious in their daily lives and in their drinking-habits; but I think that no one in political power has ever been more dissipated, more greedy, or more enslaved by his pleasures than Timolaus, as I have said.' And in the twenty-third book, when telling the story of Charidemus of Oreus, to whom the Athenians granted citizenship, he says ^c: 'It was plainly seen that he carried on his daily life licentiously, making it such that he was always drinking and getting drunk, and he even dared to seduce free-born women; he went so far in dissipation that he ventured to demand of the Council of Olynthus a lad who was comely and graceful, and who had happened to be taken prisoner along with Derdas of Macedonia.' Arcadion too (it is uncertain whether he was the Arcadion who was at sword's points with Philip^a) drank very deeply. This is shown by an epigram copied by Polemon in Epigrams compiled City by City^b: 'This monument to Arcadion, the hero of many cups, was reared beside the path leading to the city here by his sons, Dorcon and Charmylus. The man died, O stranger, of drinking neat wine from a too capacious cup.' Again, there was a certain Erasixenus who drank very deeply, as the epigram to him declares^c: 'The cup of unmixed wine, twice pledged in quick succession, carried off Erasixenus, that deep wine-drinker.' Alcetas of Macedonia also drank a great deal, according to Aristus of Salamis^d; so, too, Diotimus of Athens. The latter had the nickname of Funnel; for he would insert a funnel in his mouth and drink unceasingly while the wine poured in; hence his nickname of Funnel, as Polemon declares. That Cleomenes of Lacedaemon was another drinker of unmixed wine has already been stated^e; and that he slashed himself to death with a knife in a fit of intoxication^f is recorded by Herodotus.^g

Again, the poet Alcaeus was a drink-lover, as I have said before.^a Baton of Sinope, in his work On Ion the Poet, says ^b that Ion was a drink-lover and very much given to love affairs. Of those who drank the wine, thirty-five died immediately of a chill, and six others shortly after in their tents. The man who drank the most and came off victor drank twelve quarts and received the talent, but he lived only four days more; he was called Champion.’ Timaeus says ⁱ that ‘Dionysius the Tyrant at the Feast of Pitchers offered a prize of a golden crown to the one who first drank out his

And for this act he was admired.' As for the Feast of Pitchers celebrated at Athens,^b Phanodemus says^c that King Demophon instituted it^d when he desired to entertain Orestes on his arrival at Athens. Since Demophon did not wish Orestes to be admitted to the holy rites,^e or share in the libations when he had not as yet been tried,^f Demophon ordered the sacred utensils to be locked up, and a pitcher of wine to be set before each participant, saying that a flat-cake would be given to the one who drank out his pitcher first. He also ordered that after they had finished the drinking they should not place the wreaths they had been wearing near the sacred images,^g since they had been under the same roof with Orestes, but that everyone should twine his wreath round his own pitcher and the priestess should carry away the wreaths to the sacred precinct in the Marshes, and then complete the sacrifice in the temple. Since that time the festival has been called the 'Pitchers.' At the festival of the Pitchers it is customary at Athens to send presents as well as their fees to the sophists, who also themselves called together their disciples for hospitality. This we have on the authority of the dialectician ^a Eubulides in a play, The Revellers ^b: 'You itch to be a sophist, foul wretch, and you desire the fees and presents of the Pitchers, not lacking a dinner in your luxury.' ^c

"Antigonus of Carystus, in his work On the Life of Dionysius—he was a native of Heracleia with the nickname of Shifty ^d—says ^e that Dionysius was once feasting with his servants at the festival of the Pitchers, and being unable, on account of old age, to make use of the courtesan whom they had called in he turned and said to the other members of the party ^f: 'I cannot stretch the bow, let another take it.' Now Dionysius, as Nicias of Nicaea says in his Successions,^g had from boyhood a mad proneness to lustfulness, and used to visit common street-walkers without discrimination. Once he was walking with some disciples and came opposite to the brothel where he had been the day before and where he owed some coppers; as he happened to have them at that time he stretched out his hand in the sight of all and paid the debt. Anacharsis the Scythian was at the court of Periander when a prize was offered for drinking; and he demanded the prize because he was the first among the men present to get drunk; for he said that getting drunk was the goal and constituted the victory in a drinking-bout, precisely like the goal of victory in running.^h The philosophers Lacydes and Timon were once invited to the house of one of their disciples for two days; wishing to adapt themselves to the customs of the others there they drank heartily. On the first day Lacydes came away first, since the wine was too much for his stomach, and Timon, seeing him going away, cried out ^a : ‘ We have won great glory, we have slain godlike Hector.’ But the next day, when Timon was the first to leave because he could not drink out the cup that had been pledged to him, Lacydes saw him withdrawing and said ^b : ‘ Unhappy they whose children face my might ! ’

“ Herodotus, in the course of the second book,^c relates that Mycerinus the Egyptian learned from his soothsayers that he was to live only a short time ; so he caused many lamps to be lighted whenever night came on, and drank and made merry without stopping day or night ; he even roamed into the swamps and woods and wherever, besides, he learned there were gatherings of young people, and there got drunk. Of Amasis, too, who was also king of Egypt, Herodotus says that he drank a great deal. Hermeias of Methymna, in the third book of his History of Sicily, says ^d that Nicoteles of Corinth was a drink-lover, and Phaenias of Eresus, in the work entitled Tyrants killed in Revenge, says ^e that Scopas, the son of Creon and grandson of the elder Scopas, spent his life in drinking and returned from drinking-bouts seated on a chair of state, and carried aloft by four men he made his homeward journey in that way. Phylarchus, in the sixth book of his Histories, says ^f that King Antiochus became a wine-lover and got drunk and slept for a long time ; then when evening came he would wake again and drink some more. 'He did very little business when sober,' says Phylarchus, 'but most when he was drunk. Hence he had two men about him to administer the affairs of the kingdom, Aristus and Themison; they were natives of Cyprus and brothers, and both were favourites of Antiochus.' Another drink-lover was Antiochus, the king who was called Epiphanes and became a hostage in Rome, as Ptolemy Euergetes records in the third book of his Commentaries, as also in the fifth book,^a saying that after he had adopted Indian revels and carouses he spent large sums. What was left over of the money he would sometimes pour out in mid-day revelling, while at other times he would stand in the public streets and say, 'Let him take to whom Fortune gives.' Then he would toss the money and be off. And often he had a wreath plaited of roses on his head, and wearing a toga woven of gold he would roam about all alone with stones under his arm, which he threw at private citizens who followed him. He also used to bathe in the public baths, smearing himself with perfumes; at which time even a private citizen who caught sight of him would call out, 'How fortunate you are, sire; you smell expensive!' ^b With delight he would reply, 'I will glut you with it.' Then he ordered a jar which contained more than six quarts of greasy scent to be showered over the man's head, so that the crowd of loafers ^c rolled headlong together in the mess. It was so slippery that Antiochus himself fell down with a loud laugh, and most of the bathers suffered the same fate. Polybius, in the twenty-sixth book of his Histories, calls ^a him Epimanes ('Insane') and not Epiphanes ('Illustrious') because of his acts: 'Not only did he descend to intercourse with the common people, but he also drank in company with foreigners who were in town, and with the meanest of them as well; and if (Polybius says) he learned that any young men were feasting together, no matter where, he would appear with hornpipe and symphony ^b; the result was that most of the party got up and fled at the unexpected apparition. And often he would lay aside his royal robes, and putting on a toga he would walk about the market-place.' Again, in the thirty-first book, Polybius says ^c also that when he carried on the games at Antioch, he invited all Greeks, and any others who wanted to come, to see the spectacle. A very large number was present in the gymnasia, and he anointed all persons there with saffron oil from golden basins, and also with oil of cinnamon, nard, marjoram, and orris. Inviting them all to a banquet on one occasion, he filled up a thousand triclinia, on another occasion fifteen hundred, and all with the most extravagant appointments. The management of the service was undertaken by him personally; for he stood at the entrance introducing some, assigning couches to others; and he himself brought in the servants who carried in the courses served.

^a F.H.G. iii. 259; cf. Athen. 153 a (vol. ii. p. 196). Antiochus VII Sidetes is meant: his defeat and death occurred in 129 B.C.

And going round he would seat himself in one place, or throw himself down in another. At one moment he would throw aside a morsel or a cup just as he had put them to his lips, and jumping up suddenly he would change his place or walk round among the drinkers, receiving toasts while he stood sometimes by one, sometimes by another, at the same time joining in the buffoonery of the players. He was even brought in by the mime-performers entirely wrapped up, and deposited on the ground as though he were one of the performers ; when the symphony sounded the challenge, the king would leap up and dance naked and joke with the mimers, so that everyone felt ashamed of him. Such is the effect produced on miserable men by want of refinement in drinking. Still another drink-lover was the like-named Antiochus, the one who went to war against Arsaces in Media, as Poseidonius of Apameia records in the sixteenth book of his Histories.^a At any rate when he was killed and Arsaces was burying his body he said : ' Your rashness and drunkenness, Antiochus, have caused your overthrow ; for you expected to drink out the kingdom of Arsaces in huge cups.' And Antiochus, surnamed the Great, who was conquered by the Romans, as Polybius records in the twentieth book,^b went over to Chalcis in Euboea and celebrated his nuptials when he was fifty years old and had undertaken two most important tasks, the liberation of Greece, according to his own profession, and the war against the Romans. Falling in love with a girl of Chalcis at a critical period of the war, he conceived a strong desire to marry her, he being a wine-bibber and delighting in carouses ; this girl was the daughter of Cleoptolemus, one of the nobles, and she excelled all in beauty ; so he wasted the winter in Chalcis celebrating his nuptials there, making no provision whatever for the dangers that threatened. He also gave the name Euboea to the girl. When, then, he was defeated in the war, he fled to Ephesus with the young bride. In the second book Polybius also records^a that Agron, the king of Illyria, was so delighted with having defeated the proud Aetolians that, since he was a hearty drinker, he betook himself to carousing and feasting ; he then caught the pleurisy and died. Again, in the twenty-ninth book,^b Polybius says that Genthion, the king of Illyria, committed many licentious acts in his lifetime because of his addiction to wine, continually getting drunk both night and day. He killed his brother Pleuratus when he was on the point of marrying the daughter of Monunius and married her himself, and he treated his subjects with savage cruelty. And Polybius also says, in the thirty-third book,^c that Demetrius, the one who escaped from durance as a hostage in Rome and became king of Syria, was also a wine-bibber and spent most of the day in intoxication. So, too, Orophernes, who was king of Cappadocia for a brief period and who spurned the ways of his ancestors, introduced the Ionian^d and ingenious forms of prodigality, as Polybius says in the thirty-second book.^e

“Hence the divine Plato, in the second book,^a is right in laying down the law that ‘boys under eighteen shall not taste wine at all; for one should not conduct fire to fire; wine in moderation may be tasted until one is thirty years old, but the young man should abstain entirely from drunkenness and excessive drinking; but when a man is entering upon his fortieth year he, after a feast at the public mess, may summon the other gods and particularly call upon Dionysus to join the old men’s holy rite, and their mirth as well, which the god has given to men to lighten their burden—wine, that is, the cure for the crabbedness of old age, whereby we may renew our youth and enjoy forgetfulness of despair.’ And in a succeeding passage, he says ^b: ‘A report and tradition has slipped in among men, that this god had his reason torn from his soul by his step-mother Hera; hence he inspires Bacchic ravings and all mad dancing by way of revenge, and so he has also given wine for this very purpose.’

“Phalaeus in his Epigrams records a woman named Cleo who was a hearty drinker ^c: ‘This saffron tunic which she girded about her Cleo hath given as a gift to golden Dionysus, for that she excelled at the symposia; no man hath ever yet matched her in equal drinking.’ That womankind is fond of wine is common report. swears a most horrible oath ^a: 'So may it be mine, my daughter, to die while you are living, provided I have drunk the—wine of freedom.' Among the Romans, so says Polybius in the sixth book,^b women are forbidden to drink wine; but they drink what is called passum. This is made of raisins, and when drunk it tastes like the sweet wine of Aegosthena, or like the Cretan; hence they use it to counteract the urgency of thirst. But it is impossible for a woman to drink wine undetected; for, in the first place, the woman has no control over the store of wine; besides this, she must kiss her own and her husband's relations down to cousins' children, and do this every day as soon as she sees them. Finally, since the chances of meeting make it uncertain whom she will encounter, she is on her guard; for the situation is such that if she but take a small taste, nothing more need be said by way of accusation. Alcimus of Sicily, in that one of his volumes which is entitled Italy, says that all the women in Italy abstain from wine for the following reason ^c: 'When Heracles was in the region of Croton he came to a house beside the road; being thirsty, he went up to it and asked for a drink from the inmates. Now it happened that the wife of the proprietor had secretly opened a cask of wine; and she said to her husband that he would be doing a strange thing if he opened this cask for a mere stranger, and told him to fetch water. Heracles, standing at the front door, heard this conversation and warmly commended her husband,^a and told him to pass inside and look at the cask. The man went in and found that the cask had turned to stone. And this remains as a sign even to this day among the women of that region, that the drinking of wine must be held as disgraceful for the reason just set forth.' What Greek women are like when intoxicated is shown by Antiphanes in Hit by a Javelin^b: 'I have a neighbour who sells wine; whenever I am thirsty and go to him he knows at once—and he is the only one—how I have it mixed. Never do I remember having drunk it too diluted or too strong.' And in Mystis; the persons conversing are women^c: 'A. Will you too, dearie, have a drink? B. No, thanks, I am all right as I am. A. Well, then, hand it to me. For they say one should honour the gods to the extent of three cups.' Alexis in The Dancing-girl^d: 'A. Women have all they want if there is enough wine on hand to drink. journey away from home. Phylarchus, in the sixth book, says ^a that the Byzantians are besotted with wine and live in the wine-shops; they let out their own marriage-chambers, along with their wives, to strangers, and cannot bear to hear the sound of a war-trumpet even in dreams. Hence on one occasion, when war was made on them and they could not endure the hardships of service on the walls, their general Leonides ordered tents for the wine-dealers to be set up on the walls, and they at last reluctantly stopped leaving the ranks; this is recorded by Damon in his book On Byzantium.^b Menander in The Peplos-bearer or The Flute-girl ^c: 'Byzantium makes all the traders tipsy. The whole night through we were drinking for your sake, and, methinks, it was very strong wine too. At any rate I got up with four heads on me.' The people of Argos and of Tiryns are satirized as drunkards by Ehippus in Busiris. He makes Heracles say ^d: 'HER. Don't you know, in the gods' name, that I am an Argive from Tiryns? They are always drunk when they fight their battles. B. So that is why they always run away!' Eubulus, in Glued Together, says ^e that the Milesians are ruffians when drunk. city.' And Theopompus in the twenty-second book, when giving an account of the people of Chalcidice, in Thrace, says^a: 'For it happened that they despised the noblest pursuits, and were pretty much devoted to drinking, laziness, and excessive licence.' But the fact is that all Thracians are deep drinkers. Hence Callimachus, also, said^b: 'For verily he loathed drinking wine greedily in a long Thracian draught, but was content with a small bowl.' In the fiftieth book Theopompus says of the people of Methymna^c: 'They ate their daily food in a sumptuous manner, reclining and drinking; but they did no deed in keeping with their lavish expenditures. And so the tyrant Cleomis stopped them from these practices; he was the one who tied up in sacks the procuresses who were in the habit of seducing well-born women of the free class, as well as three or four of the most conspicuous harlots, and ordered them to be drowned in the sea.' Hermippus, too, in his work On the Seven Sages, says that Periander did the same.^d And Theopompus, in the second book of his History of Philip, says^e that 'the Illyrians dine and drink seated, and even bring their wives to parties; and it is good form for the women to pledge any of the guests, no matter who they may be. first, with tolerable looseness ; but as the drinking becomes more intense, they pull their belts more and more tightly together. The people of Ardia (he continues) own 300,000 bondmen who are like helots. They get drunk every day and have parties, and are too uncontrolled in their predilection for eating and drinking. Hence the Celts, when they made war on them, knowing their lack of self-control, ordered all the troops to prepare a dinner in their tents with the utmost possible splendour, but to put into the food a certain poisonous herb which had the effect of upsetting the bowels and thoroughly purging them. When this had been done some of the Ardiaeans were overcome by the Celts and put to death, while others threw themselves into the rivers, being unable to bear the pain in their stomachs.' ”

After this long and continuous catalogue given by Democritus,^a Pontianus remarked that wine is the source ^b of all these dread evils ; from it come intoxication, acts of madness, and drunken violence ; to those who partake too passionately of it Dionysius, nicknamed the Bronze, gave the not inept name of “ rowers of cups ” in his Elegies. He said ^c : “ Some there are, too, who ply their wine in the oarage of Dionysus, mariners of the drinking-bout, rowers of cups, and they fight for it ; for their (mad) love of it never dies.” Alexis, speaking in The Hairdresser of one who drank too much, says ^d : “ Now one of my sons, as you have just seen, has grown to be like this ; he’s an Oenopion,^e or a Maron,^f or Vintner, or just a—Timocles ; for he gets drunk and is nothing else. But the other boy—what can I possibly call him ? He's a clod, a plough, a fellow born of the sod." Yes, drunkenness, my friends, is a hateful thing, and well does Alexis again, in Ripe Fruit (the play bears the name of a courtesan), score those who lap up wine in this excessive way ^a : " You drink a deal of wine, not mixed, when you are chock full, and don't spew it forth." And in The Ring ^b : " And so, is not drunkenness the greatest bane in the world to mankind, and the most harmful ? " He has also said, in The Trustee ^c : " Much wine causes the commission of many crimes." Crobylus in The Woman who left her Husband ^d : " What pleasure, really, has continual drunkenness ? It robs a man of his reason when he is still alive, and reason is the greatest boon our human nature has acquired." So one should not get drunk. For " whenever a democratic state," says Plato in the eighth book of The Republic,^e " thirsting for liberty, lights on evil wine-pourers at its head, and going beyond all decency, becomes intoxicated with un-mixed liberty, it punishes its rulers if they are not very meek and do not supply liberty unstinted, charging them with being pernicious oligarchs, while it insults those who are obedient to the rulers." And in the sixth book of The Laws he says ^f : " For the state, like a mixing-bowl, must be well mingled ; in it the raging wine, with boiling heat,* is poured, but when subdued by another and a sober god, it takes on a noble partnership and makes a good and temperate drink." For drunken violence comes from intoxication ; hence Antiphanes, also, says in Arcadia ^a : " Indeed, when a man is sober he ought never to rage like a drunkard, governor, nor yet, when drinking is called for, ought he to be too serious. Whoever plumes himself more than a human being should, trusting in his own paltry little coinage, will discover that he is like all other men when he goes to the privy—provided he studies the marks of life which physicians know, and the direction taken by the veins, some moving upward, others downward, by which all our mortal lives are governed." And in Aeolus, attacking the outrages perpetrated by people who drink too much, he says ^b : " Macareus, smitten with passion for one of his sisters, for a while mastered his misfortune and restrained himself ; but then he took wine for his guide—a general that more than all others leads out men's rashness in front of their prudence ; and rising up at night he obtained his desire." Aptly, therefore, has Aristophanes called wine " Aphrodite's milk " ; he said ^c : " Wine, Aphrodite's milk, is pleasant to drink " ; quaffing too much of this, some conceive an appetite for illicit love.

^a Kock ii. 26 ; the title is given as The Arcadian at 586 a. The text is defective, and the last three verses may be a new fragment (Kock).

^b Kock ii. 17. The military figure of speech means that wine causes men to put rashness before prudence.

Hegesander of Delphi calls certain persons "thoroughly wine-d" ^a when he says ^b: "Combon and Rhodophon, who belonged to the governing body of Rhodes, were thoroughly wine-d. Combon, jesting at the expense of Rhodophon as a dicer, quoted ^c: 'Old man, verily young dicers press thee hard.' Rhodophon retorted by reviling the other for his craze for women and his incontinence, abstaining from no insult whatever." Theopompus, discoursing on another Rhodian in the sixteenth book of his Histories, says ^d: "Hegesilochus proved good for nothing first because of his sodden drunkenness and his gambling, and he had absolutely no credit among the Rhodians; on the contrary, on account of the prodigality of his life, he was in bad odour amongst his own companions and the rest of the citizens as well." Continuing on the subject of the oligarchical government which Hegesilochus established with the help of his friends, Theopompus then adds: "They violated many well-born women and wives of the foremost men, and corrupted not a few boys and young lads; they went so far in their licentiousness that they even presumed to gamble with one another for the possession of free-born women, and stipulated among themselves which one of the women of the city was to be brought to the winner for his enjoyment by those whose throw with the dice was the less; and they allowed no evasion, but commanded them to bring the women in whatever way they could, by persuasion or by force. Rhodians also played at this kind of dicing, but the one who played at it most conspicuously and most often was Hegesilochus himself, who presumed to rule over the state." According to Philomnestus, in his treatise On the Sminthian Festival at Rhodes,^a Antheas of Lindus, who claimed to be a kinsman of Cleobulus, one of the Seven Sages, was an older man than Hegesilochus, rich, and with a natural gift of poetry; he kept high festival^b all his life, wearing a Dionysiac costume and keeping many fellow-Bacchantes, and continually leading them forth in a revel band, day and night. He was also the inventor of verses made up of compound words, which Asopodorus of Phlius used later in his rhythmical iambic prose. Antheas also wrote comedies and many other pieces in this style, which he used to bring out dancing at the head of his phallus-bearers.^c

After listening to this Ulpian said: "In what author, my good Pontianus, is the word paroios^d found?" To which he replied: "To quote the good Agathon,^e 'you will be the death of me with your questions—you and the modern ways, using words mal à propos.' However, since it is decided that all of us shall submit to your scrutiny, Antiphanes says in The Lydian^f: 'The Colchian wench is violent in her cups (paroios).' You also, being violent in your cups and drunken, are not satisfied even yet, and you do not reflect that Eumenes of Pergamum, the nephew of King Philetaerus of Pergamum, died of intoxication, as recorded by Ctesicles in the third book of his Chronicles.^a But Perseus, who was destroyed by the Romans, did not die in that way; for in no respect did he imitate his father, Philip.^b For Perseus neither cared for women nor was given to wine; quite the contrary; not only did he drink moderately at dinner, but the friends associated with him did also, as Polybius records in the twenty-sixth book.^c But you, Ulpian, are what Timon of Phlius calls an 'arrhythmic drinker'; for this is the name he gave to those who quaff strong wine in too great quantities, in the second book of his Satires ^d: 'Or the cruel ox-cleaver, sharper than Lycurgus, who, as everyone knows, lopped off the arrhythmic drinkers of Dionysus, and cast out of doors drinking-horns and cups insatiate in wine.' But you are not simply fond of a drink.^e Such a person is called 'potic' by Alcaeus in Ganymede, thus ^f: . . . That drunkenness causes our perception to go wrong is clearly shown by the remark of Anacharsis in which he revealed that false opinions occur to drunken men. Once a fellow-drinker saw the wife of Anacharsis at the drinking-bout and said to him, 'You have married an ugly woman, Anacharsis.' He answered, 'Yes, indeed, I think so too; come, slave, fill up a stronger cup, that I may make her good-looking.' "

' ^d So do you, my comrade, drink a toast as Alexis commands in The Twins ^e : ' Pledge him here, that he in his turn may pledge another ' ; and thus we shall have what Anacreon calls the ' hearth-cup.' For that lyric poet says ^f : ' And roar not like the wave of the sea, as you drink the hearth-cup too generously with that loud-voiced creature, that Gastrodora.' ^g This is what we call the ' cup of equality.' Drink, then, and don't be afraid of falling down backwards ; for that cannot happen to those who drink, as Simonides puts it, ^h ' the wine which repels our cares.' Still, as Aristotle declares in the treatise On Drunkenness, ⁱ those who have drunk the barley-wine which they call pinon (beer) fall down on their backs ; he says : ' But a peculiar thing happens in the case of barley drinks, or the so-called pinon. The drink is mentioned by Aeschylus in Lycurgus ^c: 'Upon this he fell to drinking beer ripened with age, and swaggered loudly, rating this as courage.' Hellanicus in The Foundings ^d says that beer is made also of rye; he writes as follows: 'They drink beer made of rye, as the Thracians drink it made of barley.' Hecataeus, in the second book of his Description, after saying of the Egyptians that they were bread-eaters, ^e continues ^f: 'They grind up the barley to make the drink.' And in The Description of Europe he says that the Paeonians drink a beer made from barley, also parabias, made from millet, and even fleabane. the wand-bearer, mightily revered, hath bestowed,' says Ion of Chios in his Elegies ^a: 'For that is the excuse for every kind of lovers' chat; and the meetings of all Greeks, the mirth of princes, have arisen since the time when the clustering vine lifted up its shoot from beneath the earth, and enfolded the air in its lusty arm; from its burgeons leapt its children crowding, vocal whenever one fell upon the other, though silent heretofore. When they have ceased their outcry, they are squeezed into nectar, the only blessing which all men have in common, nature's own cure to bring gladness. Hence come mirth, children dear, friendly greetings, dancing bands; of these blessings King Wine hath shown us the true nature. For that, father Dionysus, hail! Thou delightest in men wearing garlands, thou master of merry symposia. Grant long life, thou helper to glorious deeds, to drink and sport, and have just thoughts.' And Amphis, praising the life which drink-lovers lead, says in Brothers in Love with their Sisters ^b: 'On many accounts I praise the life of drink-lovers more than the life of you who habitually have nothing but sense ^c in your skulls. of every action gets something done with fresh vigour.’”

While Ulpian was on the point of adding something to these remarks, Aemilianus said : “ It is time, my friends, that we make some inquiry into the subject of riddles ; that will give us a brief interval, at least, away from our cups,^a though we shall not follow the method of the Grammarians’ Tragedy, as it is entitled, by Callias of Athens. Let us, then, first ask what is the definition of the riddle (griphos) ; but (we will not consider) what it was that Cleobulina of Lindus propounded in her riddles (ainigmata)—for our old friend Diotimus of Olympe^{nê} has discussed them adequately ; rather, how the comic poets make mention of them, and what penalty those who failed to solve them had to undergo.” And Larensis answered : “ Clearchus of Soli gives this definition ^b : ‘ A riddle (griphos) is a problem ^c put in jest, requiring, by searching the mind, the answer to the problem to be given for a prize or forfeit.’ And again in the treatise On Riddles, Clearchus says there are seven kinds of riddles.^d ‘ Depending on a letter, as when we are to tell, for example, the name of a fish or a plant beginning with a ; similarly, when the propounder requires a word which contains or does not contain a certain letter, like the riddles called the s-less ; whence even Pindar composed an ode against the letter s,^e putting forth, as it were, a kind of riddle methods of drinking just treated, and also to the discussion of drinking-cups in the next book. ^b F.H.G. ii. 321.

^a After βα comes -σιλεύς, punning on σίλλος, satirical verse (-measure).

^b i.e. begins with the lion, Eng. Lionel, Leonard.

^c Bold-Lion.

^e This might be cited as an example of the pompous, since in lyric poetry. Then there are riddles depending on a syllable, where, for example, we are to name something measured that begins with ba, like basileus (king),^a or that ends in -nax, like Callianax, or that has the lion for its leader,^b like Leonides, or contrariwise at the end, like Thrasyleon.^c Or riddles involving a whole noun, where, for example, we must give either simple or compound nouns of two syllables, wherein the form has a pompous or, conversely, a low implication; or names which are godless,^d like Cleonymus,^e or have a god in them, like Dionysius ^f; in this case the noun may be made up from the name of either one or several gods, like Hermaphroditus; or a noun beginning with Zeus,^g like Diocles, or with Hermes, like Hermodorus; or one ending, perhaps, in -nicus.^h Those who failed to answer as required had to drink the cup.’ⁱ This, then, is the definition given by Clearchus. Now try to find out, my good Ulpian, what the cup here mentioned is.

“On the subject of riddles Antiphanes says, in The Man from Cnoethe or Pot-belly ^j: ‘Before this I used to think that people who required us to tell riddles during a drinking-bout were plainly drivelling and talking nonsense; whenever a man enjoined us to guess in succession ^k what somebody brought which he did not bring, I used to laugh, thinking he was it means “of glorious name.” Chamaileon, Ground-lion, is the converse.

^f From the god Dionysus; hence French Denys or Denis, Eng. Dennis.

^g “To begin with Zeus” was a common phrase, cf. Theocr. xvii. 1. The stem of the word Zeus, from which the compounds are formed, is Dio-.

^h Very common; e.g. Andronicus.

talking drivel of a thing which could never by any possibility happen, just to catch us. But to-day I have come to realize that it is true after all; for we are ten men contributing to a club,^a and yet not one of us contributes any contribution of these viands. ^a On the eranos see Athen. 362 e; the phrase, "bring (or contribute) an eranos"—one's share in the picnic—was used even when members were relieved of or evaded the contribution. The "ten" here are generals bribed by Philip.

talking a lot, but concerning what and to whom they thought they were saying something, they talked not at all. For the one addressed couldn't understand a word, so that, while their talk was addressed to him, they were talking a lot to themselves, and may Demeter destroy them both!' In Sappho, again, Antiphanes represents the poet as propounding riddles in the following manner, while somebody solves them thus. Sappho says ^a: 'There is a feminine being which keeps its babes safe beneath its bosom; they, though voiceless, raise a cry sonorous over the waves of the sea and across all the dry land, reaching what mortals they desire, and they may hear even when they are not there; but their sense of hearing is dull.' Someone solves this by saying: 'That being of which you speak is the state, the babes she nourishes within her are the politicians. These, by their bawling, draw hither receipts across the sea from Asia and from Thrace. The people, meanwhile, sit near them while they feed and brawl continually, neither hearing nor seeing anything. SAPPHO. You talk nonsense always. For how, father, could a politician be voiceless? B. If he is convicted three times of unconstitutional measures! ^b So there! I thought I understood what you were talking about. However, tell me yourself.' Then Antiphanes represents Sappho as ^a Kock ii. 95.

^b Proposals in the Council or Assembly were often blocked by the charge that they were unconstitutional. A legal process (γραφὴ παρανόμων) was brought against the proposer. If a speaker were convicted in three such processes, he was debarred from speaking in the Assembly.

solving the riddle thus: 'The feminine being, then, is an epistle,^a the babes within her are the letters it carries round; they, though voiceless, talk to whom they desire when far away; yet if another happen to be standing near when it is read, he will not hear.'

"Diphilus, in Theseus, says^b three Samian girls were once propounding riddles while drinking^c at the festival of Adonis; and one put to them the riddle, what is the strongest thing in the world? One of them answered, Iron, and produced the proof of this, saying, because men dig and cut everything with it and use it for every purpose. After she was applauded the second girl proceeded and said that the blacksmith possessed much greater strength, for he, in doing his job, bends the iron, no matter how strong, softens it, and does anything he pleases with it. But the third declared penem esse validissimum omnium; nam hoc, she explained, etiam fabri gementis anum perforari. Achaëus of Eretria, though a poet elegant in his style, sometimes darkens his diction and produces much that is enigmatical, as in Iris, a satyric drama. For he says^d: 'The flask made of litharge,^e full of unguent, was suspended on the inscribed pillar of Sparta by a double peg.' Now though he merely wished to speak of the white strap on which the silvery oil-flask hung, he called it an 'inscribed pillar of Sparta' instead of a 'Spartan writing-staff.' That the Spartans wrote what they wanted to say on a white strap which they wound round the 'writing-staff' is sufficiently explained by Apollonius of Rhodes in his treatise On Archilochus.^a Stesichorus, also, in Helen, spoke of 'a litharge foot-basin.'^b Ion, in Phoenix or Caeneus, called mistletoe the 'sweat of the oak' in these lines^c: 'I am nurtured by the sweat of the oak, and by the staff cut from the tall bush, and by the mantle spun from Egyptian flax, the fetter which catches the wild beast.' Theodectas of Phaselis, Hermippus says in his work On the Disciples of Isocrates,^d was very competent to discover the answer to a riddle put to him, and cleverly propounded riddles to others himself, like the one about the shadow. For he said there was something which in its nature was largest at its creation and at its decline, but was smallest at its prime. He puts it thus^e: 'What thing is that which is not among all the things that Earth, the nurse, brings forth, nor the sea, nor has any growth in its limbs like that of things mortal, yet in the time of its earliest begotten generation is largest, but at its midmost height is small, and at old age itself is again largest in shape and size?' And ^c *T.G.F.*² 740. The bird which feeds on the mistletoe is the rock-dove (Athen. 394 e); but it also eats flax seed, hinted at in "the Egyptian mantle" (i.e. field of flax); and it is caught in a hemp-net. Further complexities in the riddle are involved in the fact that Caeneus, the hero in Ion's play, was son of Coronus (Raven), Apollod. i. 9. 16; Schultz, op. cit. ii. 53 ff.

^d F.H.G. iii. 51; the name Θεοδέκτας (see Capps, A.J.P. xxi. 35) is consistently given as Θεοδέκτης in late writers.

in his tragedy of Oedipus he speaks of the night and the day in enigmatic language ^a: 'There be two sisters, of whom the one gives birth to the other, while she herself, after giving birth, is brought forth by the other.' There is a riddle related also by Callisthenes in his History of Greece ^b: 'When the Arcadians were besieging Cromnus (this is a small town situated near Megalopolis), Hippodamus the Spartan, one of the men under siege, made clear by a riddle to the herald who had come to them from the Spartans the state of affairs among the besieged, and exhorted him to report to their mother that the woman imprisoned in the temple of Apollo must be liberated within ten days, since she would no longer be capable of liberation after these days had passed. By this contrivance he plainly revealed the thing to be reported. For this "woman" is in the temple of Apollo beside Apollo's throne, being a painted representation of Famine in the likeness of a woman. And so it became clear to all the Spartans that the men in the besieged town were able to hold out only ten days on account of famine. The Spartans, therefore, understood the report and came in force to the rescue of the men in Cromna.'

"Many riddles also are of a kind similar to the following: 'I saw a man gluing with fire bronze upon another man so closely as to make them of one blood.' This means the application of a cupping-glass. And then there is the similar kind of riddle by Panarces, as Clearchus says in his work On Riddles,^a to the effect that 'a man that was not a man hit a bird that was not a bird, perched on wood that was not wood, with a stone that was not stone.' The answer to these things is, severally, eunuch, bat, fennel, and pumice. Plato, also, mentions it in the fifth book of the Laws ^b; he said that the philosophers who have deserted their little trades ^c are like people who propound ambiguous questions at dinner-parties, and like the children's riddle about the eunuch and his throwing at the bat, and what it was that they hint he threw at it, and upon what it was sitting. The riddles of Pythagoras, again, are of such a kind as the following, as Demetrius of Byzantium says in the fourth book On Poetry: 'Eat not thy heart,' instead of 'Cultivate apathy to pain.' 'Poke not the fire with a knife,' instead of 'Wrangle not with an angry man'; for anger is fire, and wrangling is a knife. 'Step not over the beam of the balance,' instead of 'Avoid and hate all mean advantage, and seek for equality.' 'Walk not on the main-travelled roads' ^d instead of 'Follow not the opinion of the many'; for every man answers too rashly, as it happens to please him; but one should go the straight road, using reason as his guide. 'Sit not over a quart-measure,' instead of 'Consider not merely the things of to-day, but be ready for the day to come.' 'When on a journey turn not back at the boundaries'; for the bounds and limit of life is death ; death, then, he forbids us to approach with pain and worry. Like Theodectas, according to Clearchus, Dromeas of Cos and Aristonymus the harp-virtuoso ^a used to play at riddles ; also Cleon, nicknamed the mime-actor, who was the best actor of Italian mimes without making up his face ^b ; he even excelled Nymphodorus in the kind of mime just mentioned. But Ischomachus the herald also emulated him, the one who used to render his imitations before groups of people standing about ; and when he became famous, he changed and began to act mimes among the jugglers.^c The riddles that they composed were of the following nature : for example, a certain countryman had stuffed himself too full and was sick ; when the physician asked him if he had not eaten to the point of vomiting he replied : ‘ Not I ! I ate to the end of my belly.’ A beggar-woman had a pain in her stomach, and when the doctor asked if she were not pregnant ^d she said, ‘ How could I be, when I have not eaten for three days ? ’ Many of the riddles of Aristonymus, also, were made up of stories with double meanings.^e And the poet Sosiphanes, reviling the actor Cephisocles for his lechery, said, ‘ I would have thrown a stone into your haunches if I had not been likely to besplash the bystanders.’ A very ancient kind of riddle, and one that is most closely related to the true nature of the riddle, has to do with logical concepts : ‘ What is it that we all teach but do not know ? ’ ‘ What is it that is the same nowhere and everywhere ? ’ And besides these : ‘ What is the same in the sky, on earth, and in the sea ? ’ This involves the use of equivocal words^a ; for the bear,^b the serpent,^c the eagle,^d and the dog^e are found in the sky, on earth, and in the sea. The riddle before this one signifies ‘ time ’ ; for time is the same simultaneously everywhere, and yet it is nowhere, because it is of such a nature as not to exist in any one place. The riddle with which we began concerns the possession of souls^f ; for though none of us understands the soul, yet we teach it to our neighbour.

means that he assumed in his own person all the characters in a mime without making up his face.

“ Callias of Athens, about whom we inquired before,^g and who flourished a little before the time of Strattis, composed the so-called Alphabet-Revue on the following plan. Its prologue is composed of the letters of the alphabet, and it is to be read in such a manner as to divide the letters according to the punctuation and bring the conclusion, in the manner of a tragic dénouement, back to the letter alpha, thus : ‘ Alpha, beta, gamma, delta, ei (which is the god’s letter),^h zeta, eta, theta, iota, kappa, labda, my, ny, xei, o,^a pei, rho, sigma, tau, y, phei and chei next to psei, and coming down to ô.^b' The chorus of women is composed by him with the collocation of letters in pairs, set to metre and accompanied by tunes in the following manner: 'Beta alpha ba, beta ei^c be, beta eta bê, beta iota bi, beta o^a bo, beta y by, beta ô^b bô'; and again, in the answering strophe of song and of metre: 'Gamma alpha,^d gamma ei, gamma eta, gamma iota, gamma o, gamma y, gamma ô,' and so for the remaining syllables in each case alike; they all have the same metre and lyric form in the answering strophes. Hence it may not only be suspected that Euripides composed the entire Medea in imitation of this, but it is also evident that he borrowed the lyric form as well. As for Sophocles, they say that when he heard Callias's work he boldly ventured to cut the sense of his verse by the metre, and hence wrote this verse in Oedipus^e: 'I will pain neither myself nor thee. Why vainly ask these things?' Thus it was from Callias, it appears, that all the other poets adopted the antistrophic structure in their tragedies. After the chorus, he again introduces a speech by the vowels, which one must read, as in the case of the foregoing, in such a manner as to divide them

^a Add ga, and so on throughout.

^e Oed. Tyr. 332, Teiresias to Oedipus; but how the verse illustrates or proves the alleged borrowing is unknown. Jebb, who does not refer to Athenaeus, says simply, "The rugged verse is perhaps designed to express agitation." It may be noted that the verse contains all the vowels excepting η. The chronology proves the absurdity of supposing that Sophocles imitated Callias. Callias won his first victory at the city Dionysia, 446 B.C. (Capps, A.J.P. xx. 346); Sophocles began to exhibit in 468. Probably the whole passage is intended as a satire on Euripides' lyrics.

according to the punctuation; in that way the method of declaiming intended by the author can be maintained according to its own peculiar force; thus ^a: 'Α. Alpha by itself, and secondly ei by itself, you must pronounce, my ladies. CHORUS. Yes, and the third vowel you will say by itself. Α. Then I will say eta. CHORUS. Say iota fourth in its turn alone, fifth ou, the sixth y, all alone. Α. But the last remaining vowel of the seven, the omega, I will pronounce for you to sound, then the seven in staves by themselves. After you have pronounced that, then say it to yourself.'

"Callias is the first to describe a letter in iambic verse, a letter vulgar in meaning, and phrased in this way: 'For I am pregnant, ladies. Yet through modesty, my dears, I will tell you the name of the babe by means of letters. There is a long, straight stroke; at the middle of it, on each side, stands a small reclining stroke. Next comes a circle having two short feet. . . .'^b Following this example, as one may suspect, the historian Maeandrius, diverging a little from exact imitation in his method of expression, composed one of his Precepts ^c even more vulgarly than the one just quoted, while Euripides, too, seems to have composed that speech in his Theseus in which letters of the alphabet are described. In that play there is an illiterate herdsman who plainly describes the name of Theseus as it is inscribed, thus ^a: ‘ Though I am not skilled in letters, yet will I tell the clear witness of their shapes. There is a circle, as it were measured off by compasses ; this has in its centre a plain mark. The second letter has first two strokes, and these are kept asunder by another in their middle. The third is like a curl turned hither and thither, while the fourth, again, has one rising stroke, and three cross-lines are propped against it. The fifth is not easy to describe ; for there are two lines standing apart, and these run together into one support. The last letter is like the third.’ The tragic poet Agathon did the same thing in his Telephus.^b For there also an illiterate man discloses the written form of the name Theseus thus : ‘ The first part of the writing was a circle with a navel in the centre ; then two upright rules yoked together, while the third was like a Scythian bow. After that lay adjacent a trident on its side ; then mounted on one rule were two slanting lines. And as was the third, so also was the last again.’ So Theodectas of Phaselis introduces an illiterate rustic who also clearly describes the name of Theseus ^c: ‘ The first part of the writing was a circle with an eye in the middle. Next, two rules of quite equal measure ; a crosswise rule binds these together clear athwart.

The third is like a twisted curl. The next looked like a trident on its side, and two rods of equal measure on top makes the fifth, and these extend together into one support. The sixth was as I described before, a curl.' Sophocles, also, wrote ^a something similar to this in the satyric play Amphiaraus, introducing there one who danced the forms of the letters.

" Neoptolemus of Parium, in his book On Epigrams, says that on the tomb of the sophist Thrasyarchus in Chalcedon is inscribed the following epigram ^b: ' My name is theta, rho, alpha, san, ^c y, my, alpha, chei, o, san; my native city Chalcedon; my profession, Wisdom.' The poem of Castorion of Soli addressed to Pan, as Clearchus says, is of this sort; each one of the measures ^d consists entirely of words so arranged therein that all its feet alike may either lead or follow; for example ^e: ' Thee, beast-tending Pan, who dwellest in that abode made wintry by the smiting of snow-darts, Arcadian land, will I praise in this clever style, composing for thee, O prince, verses all-glorious but hard to understand for one not wise to hear—thou, music-loving creature that pourest forth soothing melody from moulded wax,' ^f—and so forth,

An English example would be, "The ploughman homeward plods his weary way," in which the words can be transposed in several ways without violating the metre.

in the same manner. Now, no matter in what order you arrange each one of these measures, it will give the same rhythm, thus : ‘ Dweller in lands made wintry when the snow-darts smite ’ ; or, ‘ When the snow-darts sinite the wintry lands wherein thou dwell’st.’ Observe also that each measure contains eleven letters.^a In fact it is possible to compose a verse not only in this manner but in other ways, so that from one verse you may have several, according as you desire to use them, saying, for example : ‘ Tell me the measure of the feet taking the measure ’ ; or, ‘ Taking the measure of the feet tell me the measure.’ ‘ Nay, I will not take the measure of the feet ’ ; or, ‘ To take the measure of the feet—that will I not.’

“ In reference to the style of poem composed without an s in it, Pindar, to quote Clearchus again, wrote the following, putting as it were a kind of riddle in lyric form, since many had taken offence at him because he was unable to abstain from the letter s and they did not approve of it ^b : ‘ Erstwhile there flowed from the lips ^c of men the long-drawn-out lay, and the letter san (s) was counterfeit.^d’ One may make a note of this in answer to those who reject as spurious the song of Lasus of Hermione, entitled The Centaurs, in which no s occurs. So, too, the hymn to the Demeter of Hermione, composed by Lasus, has no s, ph, ch, and th count as one letter each; thus: se tón bolais | niphóktonois | dyscheímeron, or, niphóktonois | se tón bolais | dyscheímeron.

"There is a large store of other riddles as well ^c: 'I was born in the open, and the salt waters hold my country in embrace; my mother is the daughter of number.' pressed their heads together closely ; but when their eyes catch sight of the child of night, they refuse to nurse the ox-slaying servant of prince Dionysus.' Now some say this is inscribed on an ancient votive-offering in Chalcis,^a and that a he-goat and a dolphin are represented on it, this verse being descriptive of them. But others declare that the dolphin and he-goat figured thereon have reference to a harper's tuning-key, and that the ox-slayer, the servant of Dionysus, is the dithyramb. Others, again, say that in Iulis^b the ox sacrificed to Dionysus is struck with an axe by one of the young men. When the festival was near, the axe had been taken to a blacksmith's shop ; when he was still a young man Simonides, therefore, went to the smith to get it. But when he saw that the smith was asleep, and that his bellows^c and his tongs^d were lying about in disorder with their front parts opposite each other, he then returned and told to his companions the aforesaid riddle. For the father of the kid is the bellows, while the reckless fish is the tongs ; sleep is the child of night, and the axe is the ox-slayer and servant of Dionysus. Simonides^e also composed another epigram which occasions some difficulty to those who are not versed in history : ' I assert that he who refuses to bear away the prize of a cicada will give a big dinner to Epeius the son of Panopeus.' It is said that he trained choruses while staying in Carthaea.

Now the training-school was on a hill next the temple of Apollo, not far from the sea. Accordingly, all the men, including also Simonides' friends, drew water at the foot of the hill, where the spring was. The water was carried up for them by a donkey which they called Epeius, because the story was told that Epeius rendered that service, and in the temple of Apollo is recorded the Trojan story, wherein Epeius draws water for the sons of Atreus, as Stesichorus also says ^a: 'For the daughter of Zeus had pity on him, as ever and anon he carried water for the chieftains.' The circumstances being so, they say that any member of the chorus who failed to appear at the appointed time was required to furnish a quart of barley for the donkey. So this is the meaning of the verses, and the one who is unwilling to sing is the one who does not bear away the prize of a cicada; the donkey is the son of Panopeus, and the quart of barley is the big dinner. Similar also is the couplet of the poet Theognis ^b: 'For already the corpse from the sea summons me home, which, though dead it be, speaks with living tongue.' This signifies a cockle-shell.^c Similar also is the practice of saying words which resemble men's names, for example ^d: 'Winning in battle the might of "Glorious Victory." ' Also the well-known verses: 'Five men in ten ships disembarked in one place; there they battled among

"What penalty did they suffer in Athens if they failed to solve the riddle put to them, seeing that they drank a cup mixed with brine, as Clearchus said early in giving his definition ^b ? In the first book of his work On Proverbs he writes ^c : 'The solution of riddles is not alien to philosophy, and the ancients used to make a display of their knowledge by means of them. For in propounding riddles in their drinking-bouts they were not like the people of to-day who ask one another, what is the most delightful form of sexual commerce, or what fish has the best flavour or is at the height of excellence at that season, or what fish is to be eaten chiefly after the rising of Arcturus or of the Pleiades or of the Dog-star.' ^d Besides this, they arrange, as prizes for the winners, kisses which are loathsome to men of independent feelings, while the penalty imposed upon those who are beaten is to drink unmixed wine, which they do more gladly than they would the cup of health. In fact all this is precisely the mark of one who has made himself thoroughly at home in the writings of Philaenis and of Arcestratus, or has taken up eagerly the reading of the so-called Gastrologies ; no, the ancients preferred such problems as these : answering the first guest who recited which of course they could not lift ; the boats sank in the salt water. "Water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink." This solution fits all the conditions better than that of Probst, Bayer. Blätter 1917, 294.

an epic or iambic line, each one in turn capped it with the next verse ; or, if one recited the gist of a passage, another answered with one from some other poet to show that he had spoken to the same effect ; further, each in turn would recite an iambic verse. In addition to this each would recite a metrical line containing as many syllables as were prescribed, or as many as kept to the correct theory of letters and syllables. Similarly to what has been described, they would tell the name of each leader against Troy, or of each leader among the Trojans, or tell the name of a city in Asia—all beginning with a given letter ; then the next man and all the rest would take turns in telling the name of a city in Europe, whether Greek or barbarian, as prescribed. Thus their very play, being not unreflective, became a revelation of the friendly terms with culture on which each guest stood ; and as a reward for success they set up a crown and bestowed applause, by which, more than anything else, mutual friendship is rendered sweet.'

' This, then, is what Clearchus said. And I think that the kind of things which they had to propound was this : they were to recite a verse from Homer beginning with a and ending in the same letter : ' And she stood near and spake winged words.'^a ' Come, then, take thou the lash and shining reins.'^b ' Their round shields and fluttering targets.'^c Again, there were iambic verses likewise beginning and ending in a^d : ' A good man might he be called who brings good gifts.' Ganymede ^a : ' SLAVE. Alas, you ask questions that are too perplexing.^b LAOMEDON. Then will I say plainly ; if you know anything about the seizure of my boy, you must speak quickly before you are strung up.^c s. Is this a riddle, master, that you are putting for me to tell—whether I know anything about the seizure of the boy, or what do your words mean ? L. Here, somebody ! Bring out a strap, quickly ! s. Some kind of riddle I didn't know, perhaps ; yet in spite of that you give me this penalty ? No, not so ! you ought rather to hand me a cup of brine. L. Then do you know how you are to drink it up ? s. Indeed I do, exactly. L. How ? s. I must carry away the cup as a pledge from you——. L. No, you have got to put your hands behind your back ^d and swig it without stopping to take breath.' "

This long discussion by the Deipnosophists on the subject of riddles having ended,^e evening overtook us while we were thinking over all that had been said ; so let us postpone the discussion of drinking-cups until to-morrow.^f For, as Metagenes says in Fond of Sacrifices : ^g " I vary my talk, episode for episode,^h that I may delight the audience with a feast of side-dishes new and many,"—taking up the subject of drinking-cups in what follows.

^b The word περιπλοκαί, rendered " perplexing questions," means also the entangling folds and plaitings of a net ; γριφος (riddle) also meant a fish-net. Cf. the English use of " catch."
